I will support the Budget Committee's recommendation, which I helped formulate. It reduces the deficit by $182 billion over 3 years. It is basically a freeze below the inflation rate for most of Government, but it clearly defines our priorities and commitments. It affirms our contract with the elderly and those less able to care for themselves. It embodies the pay-as-you-go concept. If we choose to have higher growth in defense and safety net programs, we cannot continue to say "Charge it." We must pay for it. This resolution is a shared sacrifice. Let us cast this vote today and make that downpayment on a bright and prosperous future.

THE 2-PERCENT SOLUTION BUDGET

(Mr. ROEMER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Speaker, I support the 2-percent solution budget today. Our budget reduces deficits by $225 billion over the next 3 years. Such a major deficit reduction will, at first, stabilize and then reduce interest rates. Reduced interest rates will prolong the current recovery and extend the recovery into interest-sensitive areas not now enjoying growth—agriculture, for example. Reduced rates will also improve the competitiveness of American products in world trade and will enhance job opportunities for those citizens now bypassed in this recovery—minorities, the young, and the unskilled.

In short, this budget is designed to accommodate a less restrictive monetary policy yielding real interest rates 2 percentage points lower than at present. Thus, the 2-percent solution.

Finally, this far-reaching budget attempts a fair, across-the-board sacrifice on the part of all Americans in order to achieve its deficit reduction targets. The budget does not affect means-tested entitlements, but every other section of the budget makes a fair contribution.

A significant deficit reduction, with spending cuts twice the size of tax increases and with the burden fairly distributed, will yield lower interest rates, higher economic activity, and lower unemployment over the next 3 years.

The 2-percent solution—we need your help.

SPARE PARTS OVERCHARGES IN DEFENSE DEPARTMENT

(Mr. BRITT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BRITT. Mr. Speaker, we have heard a great deal about spare parts overcharges in the Defense Department lately.

This is a simple metal clip. Small businesses in my district estimated they could produce this item for $28 at most. The Defense Department paid $76 for this item.

The Armed Services Committee and the Small Business Committee have taken hundreds of hours of testimony about spare parts overcharges. It is a serious problem. The GAO estimates that we could save as much as $4 billion out of a total spare parts budget of $13 billion if we improve the system. Given the staggering budget deficits we face, it is more important than ever that we cut waste in Defense Department spending, and insure that each dollar spent contributes to the defense of this country. Increased competition and greater participation by small business in the Defense Department procurement process are the keys to solving the problem of spare parts overcharges.

MISSING CHILDREN

(Mr. REID asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. REID. Mr. Speaker, the best way to give children a sense of security and self-worth, is to demonstrate it.

This responsibility is crucial, as we endeavor to teach and protect our children against the growing epidemic of abduction, sexual abuse, and more, yes, even murder.

By setting examples and taking positive actions parents and others are working to prevent the annual disappearance of 1,800,000 children from their homes. Some are runaways, some are kidnaped by parents, others are abducted for illicit purposes, such as child prostitution and pornography. Though many of these children are returned, up to 50,000 missing children cases remain unsolved each year.

As cosponsor of the Missing Children's Assistance Act, I strongly support legislation that creates such nationally coordinated efforts as: A toll-free hotline, a clearinghouse and resource center, stranger-awareness instruction, and voluntary fingerprinting for children.

We legislators have a responsibility for our Nation's children. Though we cannot guarantee what their futures will hold, we can and must give them the present, a time to feel safe in their own homes with their own families.

OV-1 MISSIONS OVER EL SALVADOR

(Mr. WEISS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, news reports recently have documented another case of the Reagan administration thumbing its nose at Congress and the Constitution and the American people.

U.S. OV-1 Mohawk planes are flying over contested zones in El Salvador and finding themselves in situations where imminent involvement in hostilities is clearly indicated by the circumstances. These planes are reportedly identifying guerrillas' artillery fire and providing combat support for the Salvadoran Army.

Again and again and again, this administration has escalated its presence in Central America—without congressional authorization, without regard for the legality of these actions, and without concern for their consequences.

Mr. Speaker, you are absolutely right to have brought this matter to the attention of the House Foreign Affairs Committee for possible violation of the War Powers Act.

In 1962 OV-1 Mohawks began flying reconnaissance missions for the South Vietnamese Army. Congress did not act then. If Congress acts now perhaps we can prevent the tragedy of Vietnam from repeating itself in Central America.

THE STEADIER COURSE

(Mr. BARNARD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BARNARD. Mr. Speaker, every now and then, Congress has an opportunity to redirect the course of the Nation. Today we have such an opportunity.

Fueled by enormous deficits, our economy is headed on a collision course with disaster. Since the Nation's captain abandoned ship, it is up to Congress to take the helm and steer us onto a steadier course. I think that course is "the 2-percent solution."

The 2-percent solution cuts no entitlement benefits. Means-tested programs are fully funded. Other entitlements grow at the rate of CPI minus 2. Remaining domestic programs are frozen at 1984 levels.

The plan takes its greatest savings from defense but still allows 5 percent real growth in the military. This achieves economy without sacrificing security.

On the revenue side, the 2-percent solution goes one step further than H.R. 4170 by reducing the inflationary impact of tax indexing.

In other words, this plan asks for a minimum sacrifice across the board from those who can afford it while preserving the safety net for those who cannot.

It is the steadiest course for our floundering ship, and I think it deserves support.

CONGRATULATIONS HOYAS

(Mr. CONTE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, in response to the age old question, "What's a Hoya?" I offer this explanation:

H is for hot feet, high expectations, and superb handling of the ball;

O is for outrageous defense, outstanding teamwork, and original game plan;

Y is for yielding foes, yelling fans, and youthful vigor; and

A is for awesome—just plain awesome.

I salute Coach John Thompson and his 1984 NCAA championship team.

Hoya Saxa—real class.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS TO PERMIT VOLUNTARY SCHOOL PRAYER, BALANCED BUDGET AND LINE-ITEM VETO

(Mr. COURTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, at this time I would hope to offer unanimous-consent requests calling for consideration of amendments to permit voluntary school prayer, balanced budget, and line-item veto.

The Chair has ruled that in order to make these requests I must have the clearance of the majority and minority leaderships.

This request has been cleared by the minority leadership.

I would now yield to a spokesman from the majority leadership for appropriate clearance.

Mr. Speaker, I hear no response. That should make it clear to the American people who stands in the way of these three important issues—the Democratic leadership in this House.

CUBA'S INVOLVEMENT IN DRUG TRAFFICKING TO THE UNITED STATES

(Mr. LEWIS of Florida asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LEWIS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, there is strong evidence that Cuba is an active player in drug trafficking to the United States.

Cuba encourages the multibillion-dollar drug trade into Florida by offering safe harbors to Colombian drug smugglers for refueling and maintenance and by using boats with radar to help smugglers avoid detection by the U.S. Coast Guard.

It is alarming that even high-level officials are directly involved and that Cuba enjoys the generous profits from this criminal adventurism.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing two concurrent resolutions which call on the President to request that the United Nations and the Organization of American States examine Cuba's involvement in drug trafficking to the United States.

Identical resolutions have been introduced in the Senate and have broad bipartisan support.

I urge my colleagues to join with me in turning the world spotlight on Cuba's criminal conspiracy.

MEDICAL ASSISTANCE TO EL SALVADOR

(Mr. LAGOMARSINO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, the Kissinger Commission concluded that El Salvador's forces "must be significantly and quickly strengthened" and that "significantly increased levels of military aid" be provided "as quickly as possible."

Unfortunately, the administration's request for $178.7 million in supplemental assistance for military aid was not even given a chance for consideration by the House Foreign Affairs Committee, and the request for an urgent supplemental of $93 million is being seriously delayed by the other body, even though a bipartisan compromise has reduced the $93 million to $62 million. The Congress is now arguing over one-third the amount needed and still there is no approval of funds that are badly needed for the Salvadoran military.

In order for democracy to have a chance in El Salvador, the guerrillas have to be convinced that they are not going to win a military victory. The Salvadoran military also has to have the confidence that it can survive. The supplemental aid request represents the absolute minimum needed to keep the army going a few more months as well as to provide the most basic tools for medical assistance to the soldiers. A good portion of the request is for Medevac helicopters and vehicles and other medical equipment and supplies which would help reduce the loss of life of up to half the combat casualties. In Vietnam, combat wounds resulted in the death of one out of nine soldiers. In El Salvador, it ranges between one-third and two-thirds death rate. Basic medical assistance, represented by this urgent supplemental request, would provide the needed humanitarian relief that could save the lives of many more Salvadorans.

ATTORNEY GENERAL STAYING ON

(Mr. MICHEL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, it was good news, indeed, that Attorney General William French Smith has agreed to stay on in his job until a successor is confirmed by the Senate.

The Attorney General has done an admirable job as the chief law enforcement officer in this country, particularly in our war against illegal drug trafficking.

We desperately need a steady, consistent hand at the helm at Justice over the next few months.

There is no more compelling reason than the long list of legislation still awaiting enactment in this House.

In has been 14 years since we enacted a major crime bill in Congress. The Senate has acted but we have not.

There is a critical need to enact immigration reform. The Senate has acted, but we have not.

There is an urgent need to finish up much needed bankruptcy reform legislation. The Senate acted early enough to meet the court-imposed deadline, but we did not.

The Attorney General has done a superb job in helping to shepherd these bills through the Senate and we need his help in doing the same in the House.

I want to publicly express my gratitude to the Attorney General for staying on.

FUNDING THE MX MISSILE

(Mr. DURBIN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to add my voice to those of my colleagues who have already spoken out in opposition to funding of the MX missile. I have consistently opposed the deployment of the MX in the past, and I intend to maintain my opposition in this session of Congress for three important reasons.

First, one of the major reasons offered by the Reagan administration for deploying the MX is for its use as a bargaining chip in arms control negotiations. The President had promised to be more receptive in arms control negotiations in return for congressional support on the MX. Many Members of Congress were swayed by this argument and voted to continue funding the MX in last year's authorization and appropriations process. At this point Congress must seriously question the validity of the trade off between MX funding and arms control talks. We are not now engaged in either strategic or intermediate range arms reductions talks with the Soviets.

My other reasons for opposing the MX have not changed, either. I have heard no convincing argument that the MX will contribute substantially to our national defense. I see no reason to deploy these missiles in vulnerable silos, when the vulnerability of our land-based defense was the driving force behind the initial decision to develop the MX.

There is also the issue of the cost of the system. The CBO estimates that approving the funding of 21 missiles this year instead of 40 would save $4.4 billion through 1989 and that terminating the program altogether would save $14 billion. In this time of unprecedented deficits, I do not believe the Congress should vote to fund a weapons system of questionable strategic value when the money saved could be used to make a substantial down payment on the deficit.

HOUR OF MEETING ON TOMORROW

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at 10 a.m. tomorrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the majority leader, the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

AUTHORIZING APPOINTMENT TO OFFICE OF ADMINISTRATOR, FEDERAL AVIATION ADMINISTRATION

Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Senate bill (S. 2392) to authorize the President to appoint Donald D. Engen to the Office of Administrator of the Federal Aviation Administration, and ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I yield to the gentleman from California (Mr. MINETA), the distinguished chairman of the Aviation Subcommittee of the Committee on Public Works and Transportation, to explain his request.

Mr. MINETA. I thank our distinguished ranking Republican on the Aviation Subcommittee for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. Engen presently serves as a member of the National Transportation Safety Board. He has an excellent background in aviation and particularly in aviation safety, and he has been nominated by the administration to fill the vacant post of Administrator of the Federal Aviation Administration.

This legislation is necessary because section 301 of the Federal Aviation Act requires that the Administrator be a civilian. Legislative history at the time asserted that a nominee could not even be on the retired list of any service of the Armed Forces.

Mr. Engen is on such a retirement list. He had a distinguished career in the Navy and retired from the Navy in 1978. This legislation permits him to be appointed to serve as Administrator and to retain exactly the same status and benefits as any other military retiree would have as a civilian Federal employee.

I think it is important that we get this post filled at a critical time for FAA's programs, so that we have got somebody there who is clearly in charge and can clearly be held accountable for the FAA's performance.

I therefore support the bill, and appreciate the gentleman from Arkansas yielding to me.

Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. Further reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I want to associate myself with the remarks of my friend, the gentleman from California (Mr. MINETA). I too rise in support of S. 2392, which would authorize the President to appoint Donald D. Engen to the office of Administrator of the FAA, and to provide that Mr. Engen's appointment to this position shall in no way affect his rights and privileges as a retired officer of the U.S. Navy.

Title 49, United States Code, section 106, provides that the Administrator of the FAA must be a civilian. This provision has been construed to require that an individual, who is otherwise qualified to receive a military pension—as well as certain other military benefits—must give up those rights in order to become FAA Administrator.

As my colleagues are aware, Secretary of Transportation Dole has recommended to the White House, and the President has concurred, that Mr. Engen is the most qualified individual for this position. They have therefore urged the Congress to approve this bill, thereby allowing him to serve in this important capacity without giving up these other benefits.

Mr. Engen is currently a member of the National Transportation Safety Board, where he has served since June of 1982. Although much of his superior aviation qualifications were accumulated while in the military service, Mr. Engen has also played a very important role in our civil air transportation industry, having recently managed a large general aviation manufacturing division. In addition, he has accumulated approximately 6,000 total flying hours and currently holds numerous FAA certificates and ratings. In light of his extensive aviation background, I am confident that he will be able to perform his duties in a very responsible manner.

Mr. Speaker, the position of FAA Administrator is one of the most important in any administration because of the agency's responsibility to assure the highest level of safety in air transportation. Because Mr. Engen has indicated that he would be unable to accept this position unless this legislation is enacted, I urge my colleagues to support the bill so that the FAA will be given the qualified leader it needs to carry out its important mission.

Mr. Speaker, I yield further to the gentleman for any further request he might wish to make.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill about to be passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MOAKLEY). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

● Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of S. 2392 and urge my colleagues to approve this legislation, which was adopted by unanimous consent in the Senate on April 2.

As my colleagues have indicated, this bill would authorize the President to appoint Donald D. Engen as the Administrator of the FAA and, in so doing, would waive the requirement in existing law that an individual appointed to this position must first resign his military commission.

Mr. Engen is currently a member of the National Transportation Safety Board (NTSB), which is the agency primarily responsible for investigating transportation accidents of all types. In this capacity, he has had a unique opportunity to work with the FAA and has gained a valuable perspective on the agency's strengths and weaknesses in carrying out its important responsibilities.

Prior to serving on the NTSB, Mr. Engen served in the U.S. Navy for 36 years and achieved the rank of vice admiral prior to his retirement in 1978. Immediately prior to his retirement, he was the deputy commander in chief of the U.S. Atlantic Command and U.S. Atlantic Fleet, and in this capacity he was responsible for the day-to-day operations of 250 ships and 1,800 aircraft. Later, he served with a major aircraft manufacturer and was responsible for a substantial part of that corporation's aircraft production.

In addition, Mr. Engen is a licensed pilot and has flown over 200 models of airplanes, ranging from gliders to four-engine jet transports.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is clear that Mr. Engen has the knowledge and experience to be an effective Administrator of the FAA. I know that Secretary of Transportation Dole conducted a thorough search for someone to fill this important position and concluded that Mr. Engen was clearly the most qualified candidate for the job. The President has concurred in the Secretary's assessment and, for these reasons, I believe it is important that the Congress allow Mr. Engen to assume this position.

Therefore, I urge my colleagues to support S. 2392.●

Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

S. 2392

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. Notwithstanding the provisions of section 106 of title 49, United States Code, or any other provision of law, the President, acting by and with the consent of the Senate, is authorized to appoint Donald D. Engen to the Office of Administrator of the Federal Aviation Administration. Mr. Engen's appointment to, acceptance of, and service in that Office shall in no way affect the status, rank, and grade which he now holds as an officer on the retired list of the United States Navy, or any emolument, perquisite, right, privilege, or benefit incident to or arising out of any such status, office, rank, or grade, except to the extent that the Act of August 19, 1964, Public Law 88-448 (the Dual Compensation Act), as amended (5 U.S.C., et seq.), affects the amount of retired pay to which he is entitled by law during his service in the Office of Administrator of the Federal Aviation Administration. So long as he holds the Office of Administrator of the Federal Aviation Administration, Mr. Engen shall receive the compensation of that Office at the rate which would be applicable if he were not an officer on the retired list of the United States Navy, and shall retain the status, rank, and grade which he now holds as an officer on the retired list of the United States Navy, and shall retain all emoluments, perquisites, rights, privileges, and benefits incident to or arising out of such status, office, rank, or grade, and shall in addition continue to receive the retired pay to which he is entitled by law, subject to the provisions of the Dual Compensation Act, as amended.

SEC. 2. In the performance of his duties as Administrator of the Federal Aviation Administration, Mr. Engen shall be subject to no supervision, control, restriction, or prohibition (military or otherwise) other than would be operative with respect to him if he were not an officer on the retired list of the United States Navy.

SEC. 3. It is hereby expressed as the intent of the Congress that the authority granted by this Act is not to be construed as approval by the Congress of continuing appointments of military persons to the Office of Administrator of the Federal Aviation Administration in the future.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

17TH ANNUAL REPORT OF UNITED STATES-JAPAN COOPERATIVE MEDICAL SCIENCE PROGRAM FOR CALENDAR YEAR 1983—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, without objection, referred to the Committee on Energy and Commerce:

POLICE OFFICER SAVED BY BULLETPROOF VEST

(Mr. BIAGGI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, another police officer has been saved by a bulletproof vest. It happened a couple of weeks ago in my hometown of New York. The New York Post described the incident, saying:

A gunman was riddled in a blazing shootout in a Harlem schoolyard yesterday that left one cop wounded and another thanking God for his bulletproof vest. From his hospital room, a housing cop who received only a bruise after being shot in the chest at near point-blank range recalled his promise to his mother never to take off his bulletproof vest.

"Thank God for the vest," said Officer John Leho, 29.

According to the Justice Department, more than 400 police lives have been saved by the vests.

Yet, despite their ability to stop conventional handgun ammunition, the bulletproof vests worn by police are totally useless against a small class of armor-piercing "cop killer" bullets. I have authored a bill, H.R. 953, to outlaw those bullets.

Surprisingly, this legislation remains stalled in committee, largely due to the National Rifle Association, which opposes the bill because, "There has been no rash of criminal misuse of armor-piercing handgun ammunition." Frankly, I believe it is better to prevent police deaths than to respond to them. I am certain New York City Police Officer John Leho would agree with that view.

PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 280, FIRST CONCURRENT RESOLUTION ON THE BUDGET—FISCAL YEAR 1985

Mr. DERRICK. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 476 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 476

Resolved, That at any time after the adoption of this resolution the Speaker may, pursuant to clause 1(b) of rule XXIII, declare the House resolved into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 280) revising the congressional budget for the United States Government for the fiscal year 1984 and setting forth the congressional budget for the United States Government for the fiscal years 1985, 1986, and 1987, and the first reading of the concurrent resolution shall be dispensed with. After general debate, which shall continue not to exceed four and one-half hours, with not to exceed three hours to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on the Budget, and not to exceed one and one-half hours to be equally divided and controlled under the provisions of section 305(a)(3) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 (Public Law 93-344), the concurrent resolution shall be considered as having been read for amendment under the five-minute rule. No amendment to the concurrent resolution shall be in order except the following amendments, which shall be considered only in the following order, which shall not be subject to amendment, which shall be considered as having been read, and which shall be in order any rule of the House to the contrary notwithstanding:

(1) the amendment printed in the Congressional Record of April 3, 1984 by Representative Jones of Oklahoma, which shall be debatable for not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by any Member offering said amendment and a Member opposed thereto;

(2) the amendment printed in the Congressional Record of April 3, 1984 by, and if offered by, Representative Dannemeyer of California, which shall be debatable for not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by Representative Dannemeyer and a Member opposed thereto;

(3) the amendment printed in the Congressional Record of April 3, 1984 by, and if offered by, Representative Roemer of Louisiana, which shall be debatable for not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by Representative Roemer and a Member opposed thereto;

(4) an amendment in the nature of a substitute consisting of the text of H. Con. Res. 281, if offered by Representative Dixon of California, which shall be debatable for not to exceed two hours, to be equally divided and controlled by Representative Dixon and a Member opposed thereto;

(5) the amendment printed in the Congressional Record of April 3, 1984 by, and if offered by, Representative McHugh of New York, which shall be debatable for not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by Representative McHugh and a Member opposed thereto;

(6) the amendment printed in the Congressional Record of April 3, 1984 by Representative MacKay of Florida, and if offered by Representative MacKay or Representative Nelson of Florida, which shall be debatable for not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the proponent of the amendment and a Member opposed thereto;

(7) the amendment printed in the Congressional Record of April 3, 1984 by and if offered by, Representative Latta of Ohio, which shall be debatable for not to exceed two hours, to be equally divided and controlled by Representative Latta and a Member opposed thereto; and

(8) an amendment in the nature of a substitute consisting of the text of H. Con. Res. 280 as introduced, if offered by Representative Jones of Oklahoma, which shall be in order only if at least one of the amendments designated above has been adopted, and which shall be debatable for not to exceed twenty minutes, to be equally divided and controlled by Representative Jones and a Member opposed thereto. It shall also be in order to consider the amendment or amendments provided for in section 305(a)(6) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 necessary to achieve mathematical consistency. If more than one of the amendments in the nature of a substitute made in order by this resolution have been adopted, only the last such amendment which has been adopted shall be considered as having been finally reported back to the House. At the conclusion of the consideration of the concurrent resolution for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the concurrent resolution to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the concurrent resolution and any amendment thereto to final adoption without intervening motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. DERRICK) is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. DERRICK. Mr. Speaker, I yield the customary 30 minutes, for the purposes of debate only, to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATTA), and pending that, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 476 is a modified open rule providing for the consideration of House Concurrent Resolution 280, the first concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1985. The rule provides for 4 hours of general debate: 3 hours to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Budget Committee, and 1½ hours for debate on economic goals and assumptions to be equally divided and controlled under the provisions of section 305(a)(3) of the Budget Act. The concurrent resolution shall be considered as having been read.

The rule makes in order only the following amendments in the nature of a substitute, which must be offered in the following order, shall themselves not be subject to amendment, shall be considered as having been read, and shall be in order any rule of the House to the contrary notwithstanding:

First, the amendment printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 3, 1984, by Representative JONES of Oklahoma, to be debatable for 1 hour with the time equally divided and controlled by the Member offering the amendment and a Member opposed to the amendment;

Second, the amendment printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 3, 1984, by, and if offered by, Representative DANNEMEYER of California, to be debatable for 1 hour with the time equally divided and controlled by Representative DANNEMEYER and a Member opposed to the amendment;

Third, the amendment printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 3, 1984, by, and if offered by, Representative ROEMER of Louisiana, to be debatable for 1 hour with the time equally divided and controlled by Representative ROEMER and a Member opposed to the amendment;

Fourth, the amendment consisting of the text of House Concurrent Resolution 281, if offered by Representative DIXON of California, to be debatable for 2 hours with the time equally divided and controlled by Representative DIXON and a Member opposed to the amendment;

Fifth, the amendment printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 3, 1984, by, and if offered by, Representative MCHUGH of New York, to be debatable for 1 hour with the time equally divided and controlled by Representative MCHUGH and a Member opposed to the amendment;

Sixth, the amendment printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 3, 1984, by Representative MACKAY of Florida, if offered by Representative MACKAY or Representative NELSON of Florida, to be debatable for 1 hour with the time equally divided and controlled by the proponent of the amendment and a Member opposed to the amendment;

Seventh, the amendment printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 3, 1984, by, and if offered by, Representative LATTA of Ohio, to be debatable for 2 hours with the time equally divided and controlled by Representative LATTA and a Member opposed to the amendment;

Eighth, an amendment consisting of the text of House Concurrent Resolution 280, as introduced, if offered by Representative JONES of Oklahoma. This amendment shall be in order only if at least one of the amendments listed above has been adopted. It shall be debatable for 20 minutes with the time equally divided and controlled by Representative JONES and a Member opposed to the amendment.

Also, it shall be in order to consider an amendment or amendments provided for in section 305(a)(6) of the Budget Act which may be necessary to achieve mathematical consistency.

The rule provides that, if more than one of the amendments in the nature of a substitute have been adopted in the Committee of the Whole, only the last one adopted shall be reported back to the House.

Finally, consistent with the provisions of section 305(a)(6) of the Budget Act, the rule does not provide for a motion to recommit.

While this rule is not technically complex, it does involve a number of amendments and a slightly unusual procedure. Because of this, and because the matters being considered are so important, I want to take a few minutes to make sure that every Member understands what the rule does.

The rule involves what some people refer to as a "King of the Mountain" procedure. House Concurrent Resolution 280 is made in order as the original text. Eight amendments in the nature of a substitute are made in order as amendments to that. Ordinarily, since provisions of legislation which have been amended cannot be further amended, adoption of an amendment in the nature of substitute—which effectively amends all provisions of a bill or resolution—precludes further amendment. But this rule provides that adoption of one amendment in the nature of a substitute does not prevent the other amendments in the nature of a substitute from being offered. Then, because the amendments in the nature of a substitute are by definition mutually exclusive, the rule provides that, if more than one substitute is adopted in the Committee of the Whole, only one of those—the last one adopted—will be reported back to the House. Thus "King of the Mountain", where the last amendment standing is the winner.

The Rules Committee made only amendments in the nature of a substitute in order because it believes that Members are best able to make reasoned decisions about appropriate levels of Federal spending and revenues and about budget priorities if they are offered choices among complete alternative plans. Line-item decisions about funding for particular programs or about particular revenue measures are appropriately made when authorizing, appropriation, and revenue legislation are considered. The "King of the Mountain" procedure was adopted to make sure that no one is precluded from offering one of the amendments made in order. This procedure guarantees that all of the alternative budgets can be considered.

There will be adequate time later for the proponents of the amendments made in order to explain the substance of their alternatives, but I do want to take a few moments here to give a brief description of the amendments so that everyone knows at the outset what will be before us in this process.

The base text which will be before us is House Concurrent Resolution 280. This is identical to House Concurrent Resolution 282, which was reported by the Budget Committee, except that it includes the committee "pay-as-you-go" amendment as original text. This means there will not be a separate vote on that "pay-as-you-go" amendment.

The amendments in the nature of a substitute which will be in order to that are:

First, an amendment printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by Chairman JONES of the Budget Committee, which can be offered by any Member. This substitute represents the President's February budget submission, as reestimated by CBO.

Second, an amendment to be offered by Representative DANNEMEYER which assumes achievement of spending cuts recommended by the Grace Commission and enactment of other nondefense spending cuts.

Third, an amendment to be offered by Representative ROEMER which is described as "the 2-percent solution."

Fourth, an amendment to be offered by Representative DIXON which was proposed by the Congressional Black Caucus.

Fifth, an amendment by Representative MCHUGH which has been described as the "DSG" budget.

Sixth, an amendment to be offered by Representative MACKAY or Representative NELSON which is the same as House Concurrent Resolution 280 except that it does not include certain additional new spending which was provided for in the Budget Committee's "pay-as-you-go" amendment.

Seventh, an amendment to be offered by Representative LATTA which represents the President's most recent budget proposal.

Eighth, an amendment to be offered by Representative JONES—only if one or more of the above substitutes to House Concurrent Resolution 280 have been adopted—which consists of the text of House Concurrent Resolution 280, as introduced—that is, the text of the concurrent resolution without any amendments.

Let me just explain here why the Rules Committee made it in order for House Concurrent Resolution 280 to be offered at this point, if it has already been substituted for. Under the other procedures set forth in this rule, without this provision there would be an opportunity for a vote in the Committee of the Whole on every budget alternative but House Concurrent Resolution 280. If no substitute is adopted, there is, of course, no need for a separate vote on House Concurrent Resolution 280 in the Committee of the Whole, since there will be a vote on final passage in the House. But, if another alternative is approved in the Committee of the Whole, it is only fair to give Members the same opportunity to vote affirmatively for the plan recommended by the Budget Committee.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out the special effort that the Rules Committee has made this year to insure that Members of the House have the opportunity to know what is in the budget alternatives they are voting on. In the past there has been some confusion about the contents of some amendments that were offered to budget resolutions, and there have been complaints that estimates of the effects of various alternatives have been inconsistent because the alternatives have used different baselines and different economic and technical assumptions.

To insure that Members can find out what is in the various alternatives, the rule requires that all substitutes which will be offered must have been printed in yesterday's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, unless they have been introduced and are available in printed form.

To insure that all alternatives can be compared, the Rules Committee requested, and has received, cost estimates for all the alternatives from the Congressional Budget Office. These cost estimates will be available to Members on floor of the House and in the Rules Committee Office, in room H312 in the Capitol.

I would like to express the appreciation of the Rules Committee to the sponsors of these amendments for cooperation in getting amendments to the committee on a timely basis, and to the Congressional Budget Office for such a prompt response to our request. I am sure that these efforts will aid Members greatly in the difficult decisions they will be facing in the next 2 days.

Mr. Speaker, I have taken a good deal of time explaining this rule. Since there will be ample opportunity after the adoption of this rule for explanations of the various alternatives, I will say only this about the substance of the budget alternatives before us: I serve as a member of the Budget Committee. I believe that the budget we have recommended, House Concurrent Resolution 280, is a good first step toward dealing with the deficits that will strangle our economy if we do not act. It reduces the deficit by $182 billion over 3 years, yet it provides for adequate defense and affirms our contract with the elderly and those less able to care for themselves. I hope that we adopt this budget. But, most of all, I hope that we adopt one of the alternatives before us. The worst thing we could possibly do is to vote against everything because none of the alternatives seem perfect. Perhaps there are times when politicians can afford to wait for the perfect piece of legislation, so that they do not have to explain to constituents why they voted for something they were not in complete agreement with. We clearly do not have that luxury today. We must act quickly to deal with the deficits. We must choose from among the alternatives that are currently available.

This rule allows Members to choose from among the real alternatives available to us. I urge my colleagues to vote for this rule and then to vote to adopt a congressional budget that will allow us to begin to regain control of our economic destiny.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I think that there has been an adequate explanation of the rule. I believe that the Rules Committee was quite fair in acknowledging the fact that there are quite a few substitutes floating around. There are probably more floating around this time on this budget than any time since the budget process has been in being. So I am not going to belabor the point. But I would just like to point out one thing:

I have in my hand the report on House Concurrent Resolution 282. This happens to be the House Budget Committee report that was filed by the House Budget Committee. But would you believe that this rule does not provide for consideration of the budget resolution reported by the committee itself? It does not make in order House Concurrent Resolution 282 as one of the eight substitutes. Instead, this rule provides for the consideration of House Concurrent Resolution 280, a resolution introduced by the gentleman from Oklahoma the day before House Concurrent Resolution 282 was reported by the committee.

Now, why would the chairman introduce one resolution and then have the Budget Committee report a second resolution, only to go to the Rules Committee and obtain a rule on the first resolution?

Well, last year, as everybody knows, was the beginning of the gimmickry. We had the slush fund gimmickry last year.

Now, are we having that again this year by the changing of the bills or the resolutions so that the chairman of the committee could resort to this procedure in order to avoid a vote on this year's new gimmick, the so-called pay-as-you-go amendment, which would apply only to selected parts of the budget rather than to all its parts?

Wait until next year, and we will probably have another gimmick.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for an explanation, which I think the gentleman already knows?

Mr. LATTA. I will be happy to yield to my chairman.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, the difference in House Concurrent Resolution 280 and 282 is that House Concurrent Resolution 280 is the basic committee bill with the pay-as-you-go committee amendment, that we passed in committee, incorporated into it. House Concurrent Resolution 282 is the basic committee bill without the committee pay-as-you-go amendment.

I think the gentleman is well aware of that.

If the gentleman desires not to have the pay-as-you-go amendment, there are at least two substitutes which would take that out and would freeze spending.

So that is the explanation. It is not a gimmick. As a matter of fact, if the House in Gramm-Latta 1, 3 years ago, had put ourselves and our budget process on a pay-as-you-go basis, perhaps we would not be facing such unprecedented Federal deficits.

Mr. LATTA. Let me say to the gentleman that if he had voted for the cuts that we made in Gramm-Latta 1 and 2 and the Latta-Michel budget in 1982, we probably would not be in the position we are in today. Hopefully, before this debate is over, the gentleman will join this side and make some real cuts.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. I will say to the gentleman, if he will yield, that if the gentleman's alternative budget in 1981 had passed, we would not be facing these deficits. We would have a balanced budget, in reality.

Mr. LATTA. Well, let us wait until we get to the debate on the resolution itself.

Let me say that the gentleman just concurred in what I said, they did not have this gimmick in House Concurrent Resolution 282 so they had to resort to House Concurrent Resolution 280.

But let me say, as far as the Rules Committee is concerned, I think it has done a good job in reporting out a rule that everybody can live with. There were a couple of amendments that were requested that were not made in order, including one that was discussed during the deliberations of the Rules Committee yesterday, one that was raised on his side of the aisle, about the so-called pay-as-you-go thing. I was quite surprised that the majority did not grant a rule that would permit the Democratic side to strike that so-called pay-as-you-go as they brought it up in the Rules Committee.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER).

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I would hope that we would understand for a moment what this rule does. What this rule does is that it says the majority side is entitled to bring six budgets to the floor, the minority side is entitled to bring two budgets to the floor. That is a 3-to-1 margin in terms of considering these important matters.

The Rules Committee has obviously decided that the majority side is going to be given as much time and as many budgets as it needs to try to get something passed here which fits the majority's version of what should be done rather than giving the minority equal time.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I just asked the gentleman to yield for a clarification. The minority will have the right to offer three. I think the gentleman may be overlooking the President's own budget, which we have made in order that any Member of the minority can offer.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman and I know the gentleman is being most generous in that since the President himself no longer ascribes to that particular budget. We know that the gentleman was trying to be magnanimous, but somehow his magnanimous nature strikes this gentleman as being something the minority Members of the body would hope to follow through on.

Mr. DERRICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. DERRICK. I would like to point out to the gentleman that no other Member of the minority asked the Rules Committee to make any other substitute in order. You have to get up there and ask us; are we supposed to read your mind?

Mr. WALKER. If the gentleman would allow me to reclaim my time, I know that there were some Members of the minority such as Mrs. ROUKEMA of New Jersey, Mr. FRENZEL of Minnesota, who did ask for amendments to be made in order, and that those were specifically turned down by the Rules Committee.

So I think that we do have a situation where minority viewpoints and minority amendments were turned down by the Rules Committee, and it still comes back to the point when we come to the floor, it is a 6-to-2 margin. It is a 3-to-1 margin in terms of majority offerings and minority offerings.

One of the most important parts of this rule that causes us some difficulty is the fact that the last bite of the apple is going to go to the majority so that we can go through the whole process here. We can get many issues resolved only to have the majority to be able to come back and give us a budget that will give them the last bite at the apple, regardless of everything else we have done.

That seems to me to be unfair too, in terms of the kinds of issues we may want to resolve on this floor. The point is this: That the party that wants the country to believe that it stands for fairness shows us again that its deeds speak louder than words. This rule gives the minority a little, but it gives the majority a lot. This rule is typical of the way we operate around here all the time: Using the power of the majority to give special advantages to the majority when it comes to consideration of legislation.

We are going to be discussing very important matters here; yet this rule says that the most important issue is giving the majority the power to crush minority opinion. Now, that may not make much difference anyhow because the entire budget process is so terribly flawed.

History shows us that whatever we do here is probably going to be irrelevant, and let me just cite some figures: The gentleman from Oklahoma said a few moments ago that it was the budget that was passed in 1981 that created the deficits. I would suggest that the whole budget process for the last 5 years is what has created the deficits, because if you look back you will find out in fiscal year 1980 we had a First Budget Resolution that proposed outlays of $532 billion. We spent $47.6 billion more than that.

In 1981, we spent $43.6 billion more than we said we were going to do. In fiscal year 1982 we spent $33 billion more than we said we were going to. In fiscal year 1983 we spent $26 billion more than we said we were going to, and in fiscal year 1984, we have spent $3.5 billion more than we say we are going to.

That totals $153.9 billion; that comes awfully close to being where the budget is. In other words, the congressional overspending, beyond what we said we were going to do in our budget, is what has caused deficit problems out there, and it seems to me that the American people ought to realize that while we may have a lot of fire and smoke out here, it is probably going to be very irrelevant anyhow.

This rule gives the minority a little bit, as I said before, it gives the majority an awful lot. This rule is unfair, and demonstrates again the abuse of power that characterizes majority rule in this body.

● Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, this rule does not provide for openness and fair deliberations. Extensive debate is allowed, and we will have no less than eight budget options from which to choose. The "last passed wins" rule is not perfect, but it far surpasses last year's "first over the top" rule which eliminated debate and amendment.

But to say that this is at least not a blatant gag rule is surely to damn with faint praise. The options offered do not provide a reasonable range. They do not allow amendments. They only allow substitutes.

I am particularly incensed that this rule does not even allow debate on the budget resolution as reported by the House Budget Committee. Our committee reported a basic bill and an amendment. I felt the two should be considered separately, and so moved to divide the question in committee. However, the Rules Committee has chosen to offer us the budget with the amendment already permanently attached.

The Budget Committee retains jurisdiction on the budget, and should be allowed to offer its budget recommendation on the floor as reported. There is no reason why we should allow the Rules Committee capriciously to repackage the budget as it wishes.

I also oppose this rule because it initiates debate on a resolution and amendments that have been hastily and hurriedly considered. Our committee markup was a sham, with no disclosure or notice granted the minority. No chance was offered for debate or deliberation. Moreover, except for the caucuses that constructed them, no one is familiar with the alternative budget amendments.

This limit on consideration of the budget is particularly odious because this year, at last, there is the beginning of a consensus on deficit reduction. We should encourage and build that consensus, Mr. Speaker, not gag it. It is not sufficient simply to allow the consideration of several alternatives. We should instead be encouraging a consensus on a few approaches, not dividing Congress again between eight different packages.

Finally, I oppose the rule because it does not grant consideration of an amendment I offered in the Budget Committee and testified on before the Rules Committee which would require that all new taxes be used only for deficit reduction. Unless and until deficits are sharply reduced, that should be the only purpose of new taxes. The House should be allowed to vote on such a principle.

My amendment which is not a full substitute is typical of amendments which raise important questions, but which have been gagged by the committee.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to join me in voting no on this rule.●

● Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to House Resolution 476, the rule for consideration of the first budget resolution for fiscal year 1985. I testified before the Rules Committee yesterday and requested that a rule be made in order to consider my amendment to allow for a specific vote on the cost-of-living adjustment delay proposed in House Concurrent Resolution 280 and House Concurrent Resolution 282.

This rule, House Resolution 476, approved by the Rules Committee, does not make my amendment in order and denies the 3 million civilian and military retirees a vote on their retirement inflation adjustment.

I include my testimony before the Rules Committee and my amendment at this point in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF CONGRESSMAN FRANK R. WOLF BEFORE THE HOUSE RULES COMMITTEE ON THE FIRST BUDGET RESOLUTION FOR FISCAL YEAR 1985

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the opportunity to testify before this Committee today. I would like to urge your consideration and the Committee's adoption of a rule which would allow for an amendment to be offered to the Budget Resolution to repeal the Budget Committee's proposed delay of the cost-of-living adjustment for the nation's civilian and military retirees.

I want to be brief. There are two main issues I want to raise about this amendment being offereed by myself, Mr. Parris and Mrs. Holt to the Budget Resolution to be considered by the House. First, I believe the nation's 3,286,486 government retirees deserve an up-or-down vote on their inflation index. In the past few years, government retirees have been the victim of continual delays and changes in the computation of their COLA. Such an attack on the retirement system of federal and military employees has perpetuated a general lack of confidence in a benefit which has traditionally attracted many people to service in the federal government.

The argument has been made that Social Security beneficiaries have faced delays in their adjustments; however, I would like to point that such delays were incorporated in a package which dealt specifically with Social Security, and not the entire federal budget. Furthermore, the Social Security Act Amendments legislation was intended to reform the Social Security System and ensure its continued stability. The delay in COLA for federal retirees is solely intended to effect a budget reduction and should thus be treated differently. I believe it is only fair that federal and military retirees be given a specific vote on their benefits.

Secondly, today is April 3. The delay proposed in the budget resolution would take effect in less than 60 days if it were enacted today (that assumes that the Senate acts, conference action is completed, a second budget resolution is drafted, approved and conference with subsequent reconciliation action being finished happens before that date).

I believe we have an obligation to legislate in a timely and equitable fashion which allows individuals who are dependent on Congressional actions to plan for their future. Retirees who estimate taxes and those who are faced with other personal spending decisions would be unfairly penalized by a delay now in the COLA. We have a duty to provide adequate notice of changes in retirement benefits. These retirees should not be penalized in June for action the Congress has failed to complete during the past 15 months.

Mr. Chairman, I urge the Committee to provide a rule for the consideration of this amendment.

AMENDMENT TO HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 282 OFFERED BY MR. WOLF

In the matter relating to the level of total budget outlays for fiscal 1985, increase the amount by $850,000,000.

In the matter relating to the amount of the deficit in the budget for fiscal year 1985, increase the amount by $850,000,000.

In the matter relating to budget outlays for functional category 600 for fiscal year 1985, increase the amount by $850,000,000.

In the matter relating to reconciliation instructions to the Committee on Armed Services contained in section 2(c), strike out "$300,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$0".

In the matter relating to reconciliation instructions to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service contained in section 2(f), strike out "550,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$0".

REPEAL COLA DELAY

EXPLANATION OF AMENDMENT

This amendment would eliminate the proposed Cost-of-living adjustment (COLA) delay for the nation's civilian and military retirees. The Committee budget recommends delaying the planned COLA of June 1984 until January 1985. This amendment would repeal the Committee's recommendation and provide a June, 1984, COLA adjustment.

SUMMARY OF PROVISIONS

Section 1—applies to total budget.
Section 2—applies to the deficit.
Section 3—applies to Income Security provisions under 600 of the budget.
Section 4—Reconciliation instructions (House Armed Services Committee).
Section 5—Reconciliation instructions (House Post Office and Civil Service Committee).

COSTS, FISCAL YEAR 1985

Budget authority, $0.
Budget outlays: Civilian $0.30 billion, military $0.55 billion, total, +$850,000,000.●

Mr. DERRICK. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 302, nays 89, not voting 41, as follows;

CBO COST ESTIMATES OF AMENDMENTS IN THE NATURE OF A SUBSTITUTE TO HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 280

(Mr. DERRICK asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. DERRICK. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Committee on Rules, I am submitting cost estimates prepared by the Congressional Budget Office of all of the amendments in the nature of a substitute to the budget resolution made in order under the rule.

U.S. CONGRESS,
CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET OFFICE,
Washington, D.C., April 3, 1984.

Hon. CLAUDE D. PEPPER,
Chairman, Committee on Rules, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: As you requested, I am enclosing CBO estimates of amendments in the nature of a substitute to the House Budget Committee-reported budget resolution. The estimates are consistent with the assumptions of the House budget resolution baseline as utilized by the Budget Committee. For national defense the baseline is the Administration's February request. Estimates are provided for the following plans:

H. Con. Res. 280, the House Budget Committee's reported resolution with the Committee amendment.

Mr. Latta's substitute.

Mr. Roemer's substitute.

Mr. McHugh's substitute.

Mr. Dixon's substitute, H. Con. Res. 281.

Mr. Dannemeyer's substitute.

Mr. MacKay's substitute.

The Administration's February budget.

We would be pleased to provide further details on these estimates, if you wish.

Sincerely,

RUDOLPH G. PENNER.

FIRST CONCURRENT RESOLUTION ON THE BUDGET—FISCAL YEAR 1985

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to House Resolution 476 and rule XXIII, the Chair declares the House in the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the concurrent resolution, House Concurrent Resolution 280.

The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. MOAKLEY) will preside over the Committee of the Whole.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, I make this parliamentary inquiry because there have been some rumors that we are going to reverse the procedure that we normally have followed in the presentation of the budget.

Under existing rules and past precedents, we have had the debate on the Humphrey-Hawkins economic matters prior to the general debate. That is consistent with section 305 of the Budget Act, which reads as follows:

Following the presentation of opening statements on the First Concurrent Resolution on the Budget for a fiscal year by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on the Budget of the House, there shall be a period of up to four hours of debate on economic goals and policies.

So I make this inquiry as to whether or not we are going to reverse the procedure in an attempt to avoid this particular rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that after opening statements the Humphrey-Hawkins debate will then take place. The rule contemplates the normal procedure in the statute.

Mr. LATTA. I thank the Chair.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the resolution (H. Con. Res. 280) revising the congressional budget for the U.S. Government for the fiscal year 1984 and setting forth the congressional budget for the U.S. Government for the fiscal years 1985, 1986, and 1987, with Mr. MOAKLEY in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the concurrent resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to the rule, the first reading of the concurrent resolution is dispensed with.

Under the rule, the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. JONES) will be recognized for 1½ hours, and the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATTA) will be recognized for 1½ hours. Then for opening statements by the chairman and the ranking minority member of the Committee on the Budget, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois, (Mr. SIMON) and the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATTA) for 45 minutes each to control debate on economic goals and policies. After this 1½ hours of debate has been consumed and yielded back, the Chair will recognize the chairman and the ranking minority member of the Committee on the Budget to control the remainder of the 3 hours of debate.

The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. JONES).

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, the House now begins debate on a budget for fiscal year 1985. The decisions we make here may well decide the condition of the economy for the United States in the near future as well as for the years ahead. The competitiveness of American workers, the availability and affordability of homes for our people, the efficiency of our Military Establishment, and the level of assistance for our neediest citizens all depend upon what we begin to do here today.

Interest rates, the level of the dollar, growth rates and inflation rates all will respond to what we do here.

The House has many choices before it—difficult and confusing choices.

I ask that each Member set two standards for this debate: First, any budget you support must be honest and realistic. Do not buy any smoke. Do not accept unidentified savings which will never materialize, and do not depend on acts of grace for budgetary salvation.

Second, any budget you support, you must be willing to enforce. Budgets are not enforced by abstract rules or special police. Budgets are enforced by votes, votes of the Members of Congress, by a majority of our Members. Those who vote for the budget which passes must be prepared to make individual votes after that to enforce those budget decisions.

An honest budget and an enforceable budget, that is the test the House must meet.

And what if we fail that test? We can reject all these budgets or we can pass a budget that cannot or will not be carried out; but if we do that, I believe that we guarantee that several things will happen. First of all, the public will declare a bipartisan plague on both our partisan houses. We will all be tarred with failure, the just and the unjust; but those who are most responsible for this failure will be found to bear the blame in the months and years ahead more fully.

The mysterious mechanism which we call the "markets" will begin to panic if we fail. The "markets" do not expect too much from us, but they do expect realistic deficit reduction in the range of $150 billion to $200 billion over the next 3 years. If we fail to accomplish that this year, you will begin to see the United States and the world economy start to become unglued. How sudden that unraveling will occur, I cannot say, but just as sure as we are here today, it will happen.

Therefore, I say to Members on both sides of the aisle and of all parts of the political spectrum, this House must pass an honest and an enforceable budget.

The budget before us that best meets these tests is the one put forward by the Budget Committee. This $182 billion deficit reduction budget has two important concepts which are built into the budget process for the first time this year, the first concept being that of a modified freeze, taking all spending and treating it alike and saying there is a limitation on the growth of that spending. That is the starting concept of a modified freeze. You may agree or disagree with where that freeze is, but it is an important new concept.

The second important concept is a "pay-as-you-go" concept, which says that any new spending or any real spending increases over inflation or this modified freeze limitation must be deficit neutral. It must be paid for in our time by either new revenues or by additional spending cuts elsewhere.

This budget provides a "pay-as-you-go" real increase of 3½ percent for defense and for key programs for the needy.

This budget the committee has reported fully protects social security and the social safety net against inflation and then it freezes all other spending below the rate of inflation.

The committee budget proposes tax increases of $49 billion—a level, I might point out, which has been approved by President Reagan and by congressional Democrats and Republicans alike.

Now, there are some Members who want no tax increases. Many others want more revenue. The committee settled on a level that we believe can be passed by the Congress and signed by the President this year. The House in its wisdom is free to raise even more revenue than is included in the budget when it takes up the Ways and Means tax package next week and the committee bill provides that those new revenues will go into deficit reduction.

The committee bill provides for a 3½ percent real growth for defense to be paid for by these new revenues. We should pay for our defense in our own time, not borrow and put this debt on the backs of our children and grandchildren. The problem we have gotten into as a government, as a country, is that we are expecting too much from our Government. We are expecting the best, the most prestigious military defense to protect us in our time. We are expecting income security. We are expecting the best of everything Government can provide and we are going to the window with our credit card and saying, "Charge it, but don't send us the bill. Send the bill to our children, to our grandchildren."

It seems to me we ought to start adopting a policy that what we want in our time to protect our generation, we ought to begin to pay for ourselves, because our children, our grandchildren, are going to have their own defense needs. They are going to have their own education needs. They are going to have their own infrastructure needs and if we give them that debt requirement, plus our own, we are doing a great injustice to future generations of this country.

The committee bill calls for full protection against inflation for social security, which last year was put on a "pay as you go basis" and for the means-tested programs affecting the truly needy in our society.

The committee bill requires $12 billion in reconciliation savings in other entitlement programs. Many, including myself, believe that more needs to be done to reduce growth in nonmeans tested entitlements. This is a very large part of the Federal budget, but the committee has settled on an amount which we are certain that Congress can accomplish this year.

The fact that the Republican substitute has a similar amount in some of these key reductions in entitlement spending growth indicates that this is something that we can pass, we can enforce, and we can be honest with the American people on domestic spending.

The committee bill provides 3½ percent real growth in safety net programs and holds all other programs at 3½-percent nominal growth, which is about two-thirds the rate of inflation, certainly less than inflation.

The committee also combed the Grace Commission report for possible administrative savings. We incorporate some legislative savings recommended by the Grace Commission into this budget and we anticipate they will come up in the reconciliation bill next week.

But in addition to that, we think about $2 billion in administrative savings can be accomplished by this administration without any additional need for legislation, and that is in the budget also. It is about a billion dollars less than what the Senate Republicans and the President included in their budget reduction package; so combined with entitlement and domestic discretionary savings, this results in a $17 billion decrease in domestic spending.

So that is the outline of the committee bill. It is a realistic budget which I as chairman of the Budget Committee intend to enforce. I believe it is the best among the options available, when you apply the test and the standards that I have outlined earlier.

Members will have a full opportunity to voice their opinions and to vote on the alternatives today and tomorrow. The hours ahead will be contentious, without doubt, but it is my opinion that at the end of this process the House of Representatives will have adopted a budget, that this body will enforce that budget, abide by the decisions we are telling the American people we will make today and tomorrow and that next week we can begin to implement that budget with a reconciliation bill and with a tax bill and send these main elements of the 1985 budget to the other body and help put some pressure over there on that body to get its act together and to start dealing with these ballooning Federal deficits.

I urge attention be given to this debate. I urge that we look at these deficits honestly and pass a budget that we are going to enforce to get these deficits down.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, hopefully by tomorrow night the House will have adopted one of these substitutes and sent the matter over to the other body so that we can sit down in conference and come up with a budget that will be for the best of all Americans.

I think one thing we cannot lose sight of during this debate is that the budget is only a framework for later action and regardless of which budget is adopted, the individual votes day after day on appropriation bills in this House are what really count.

Certainly we have seen Members vote on appropriation bills for more and more spending day after day, week after week, month after month, only to go out and say we have to do something about the deficit.

Now, let us not kid ourselves about what we do when we pass a budget resolution. We do not hold down deficits merely by passing a budget resolution. As a member of the Rules Committee I know whereof I speak when I say the big spenders can always get a waiver from the 2-to-1 Democrat-controlled Rules Committee in order to spend beyond the Budget Act. What really counts is what happens on the floor of this House day after day on the bills which appropriate the money for every conceivable program or project known to man. Go back just to January 1 of this year and review some of the budget busters passed by this House this year.

Certainly the United States is experiencing an economic revival which is the envy of a good many people in the Democrat ranks and one which is confounding most of the economists. Last year the economists were saying that it was a mysteriously average postwar recovery. Now all the evidence suggests it is an above average recovery and expansion.

The good news that comes to hearten the marketplace has jolted the naysayers and the merchants of gloom. My Democratic friends who were gleefully laying plans to use the the economy as an issue against the President and other Republicans this fall are now having to concoct other campaign issues, using the deficit demogoguery as a scare tactic to try to upset the psychology and the expectations of the credit market, for one.

Is it working? No, it is not working.

We see in America the free enterprise system really working for the benefit of Americans. We see an economic program that has brought expansion to this country.

The productive power of American industry has started reasserting itself. We have taken off some of those bureaucratic regulations. As a matter of fact, the Federal Register last year was reduced about one-third in size.

We see American industry flexing its muscles in many sectors of the economy as the upsurge in the gross national product indicates. Only yesterday there was a clamor by Democrats to borrow billions of dollars to be used to create leaf-raking-type jobs when what was needed was to unfetter the American giant and let employed taxpayers keep a little more of their hard-earned wages to buy goods and services they wanted, rather than to send their money to Washington to be distributed as Washington would like to distribute it.

Since the recession, though, Republican economic policies have contributed to the creation of well over 4 million new jobs. Our Democratic friends just cannot admit the fact that we have a recovery, let alone its strength and the breadth of its base.

Remember where we were when our former President, Jimmy Carter, left office? Remember 21.5-percent interest rates and 12.4-percent inflation rates?

I do not want to remember and I am sure the American people do not want to remember those high rates. Look around at the evidence of a rebounding economy as proof that these policies have started to turn this country around. Remember, this sustained economy is already 16 months old.

Through January real personal income, meaning income left after adjusting for inflation, had risen $75 billion since the low of August 1982. With more income, Americans are spending more. In February retail sales were $106 billion, 23 percent above the recessional low of $86.5 billion.

The first quarter real gross national product grew by 7.2 percent according to preliminary estimates, well above expectations and equal to CBO high growth baseline assumptions. Over a five-quarter interval, this is the strongest recovery since that of 1961.

Unemployment, which peaked at 10.7 percent in December of 1982, was down to 7.8 percent in February, exceeding all expectations, and employment has increased by 4.9 million over the same period. Unfortunately, in Ohio and other States which raised their taxes to gobble up the tax reductions given by the Reagan administration, we still have 2.5 to 3 percent more unemployment than the national average. In February employment increased in 70.2 percent of U.S. firms. Other February indexes that auger for a bright economic future: a survey which projected the highest 3-month hiring rate in 5 years. The number of persons unemployed 15 weeks or longer had decreased 1.7 million since the depths of the recession. And since last December the number of laid-off workers had been nearly cut in half.

February reports showed an especially satisfying turnaround in the automobile industry with unemployment falling in the year from 24.2 to 5.4 percent. This industry had 238,000 more people working than at the low point of the recession.

It was reported in February that domestic auto sales increased to an 8.5 million annual rate, an increase of 39.7 percent from 1 year earlier. It was the first time in 4 years that automobile sales had turned upward. The last years of the Carter-Mondale administration saw automobile sales drop without interruption. Auto plants are up to speed with the capacity utilization doubling from recession lows of 35.8 to 82.2 percent.

Certainly the American people understand that if we had gone the liberal Democrat route and taken more money in taxes from the American people and put it into leaf-raking jobs, these permanment type jobs would not now be filled.

Increased production in our factories are encouraging. They are operating at their highest capacity levels in nearly 2½ years, 80.7 percent in February.

Now 92 percent of plant capacity idled in the recession has been brought back on line in 15 months up to February.

Consider these other items that attest to the growing health of the American economy: new orders for manufactured goods rose 1.2 percent in January alone, following 1.6- and 2-percent increases in December and November, respectively. In the first month of the new year new orders for nondefense capital goods rose 2.3 percent, the best in 4 months.

Manufacturers reported unfilled orders increased 1.6 percent in January, the 11th consecutive monthly increase.

Firms are attempting to rebuild their inventories. A combination of low inventories, a high level of unfilled orders, and a record work week mean additional production and job gains ahead.

The report on housing is equally gratifying. February housing starts more than doubled, reaching their highest point in 5 years, recording a 162-percent increase from 840,000 in November 1981 to 2,197,000.

Building permits in February more than doubled—with a 166-percent increase from 730,000 in October 1981, to 1,941,000. January new home sales were up 106 percent, 688,000 versus 334,000 in September 1981. Also on the plus side, average monthly mortgage payments have risen only $4 under the Reagan administration, compared to the $342 rise between January 1977 and January 1981 ($256 to $598).

Perhaps the best news of all is the throttling down of inflation. In the final 2 years of the Carter-Mondale administration it was, respectively, 13.3 and 12.4 percent. For all of 1982, it was 3.9 percent. For basic necessities—housing, food, medical care, and energy—the inflation rate was 3 percent in 1982—in contrast to 17.4 percent in 1979 and 13.8 percent in 1980, both Carter-Mondale years. Since the poor spend a larger share of their money on these basics, they have been helped most by this dramatic drop during the Reagan administration.

This administration has not been unmindful of the truly deserving who look to the Federal Government for help. It is estimated that the number of households receiving housing subsidies will rise from 3,253,000 in 1980 to 3,827,000 this year. And predictions are that the number of food stamp recipients, 20,200,000 in 1980, will climb to 20,540,000 this year.

While it is thought that the number of medicaid beneficiaries may drop slightly this year, to 22,700,000 from 22,881,000 in 1980, the number of medicare recipients is expected to show an increase over the same period, from 27,273,000 in 1980, to 29,663,000 this year, and the number of civil service retirees—1,712,000 in 1980—is expected to reach 1,980,000 this year.

Democrats have been saying ever since the economy turned around in late 1982 that the high interest rates would insure that the recovery would not last long, and that it would primarily be led and driven by consumption. In other words, the Reagan recovery would be a pure Keynesian, rather than a supply-side recovery in which investment in new plant and equipment play a prominent role in broadening the recovery. All of this gloom and doom has turned out to be wrong.

Just 1 year ago CBO was forecasting real economic growth for 1983 at 3.9 percent. It turned out to be a 6.2 percent in its latest forecast—a forecast by the way, upon which all of the alternative budget plans must be based—CBO shows first quarter real growth at 4.8 percent, whereas in fact the Commerce Department's flash figure for the first quarter is 7.2 percent. That is very close to CBO's so-called high-growth alternative forecast of 7.3 percent.

On the day that this flash estimate was released, I asked CBO to reestimate the deficits that would result from the rose garden budget plan if its more optimistic projections realized. The results were dramatic.

Cumulative deficits from 1985–87 would be more than 25 percent lower, and deficits would be on a downward, rather than on a flat trajectory when better economic performance was assumed.

Do you think that perhaps the Democrats may be deliberately using gloomy economic and deficit forecasts as a scare tactic to force both the large tax increases, and deep defense cuts, that they want? I would like to think that this is not the case.

Perhaps the flash first quarter GNP estimate was just a flash in the pan. The data on the economy which came out since March 21 do not suggest that. On March 23, the Labor Department reported that the Consumer Price Index rose by only 0.4 percent in February.

On March 30, the Commerce Department reported that the Index of Leading Economic Indicators rose a strong 0.7 percent in February, suggesting a continuation of rapid economic growth. On March 30, it also was reported that new home sales surged 7.7 percent from January.

On April 2, it was announced that factory orders in February rose 0.7 percent, suggesting large future gains in production. Embodied in this statistic was a 6.2-percent increase in spending on nondefense capital goods, a major indicator of business investment.

In fact, contrary to what the Democratic doomsayers were predicting, investment spending has been a significant factor in the economic expansion. Yet, from the fourth quarter of 1982 to the fourth quarter of 1983, real nonresidential fixed investment rose 11 percent, or almost twice as fast as overall economic growth. This represents the strongest first year of investment recovery since 1950.

Finally, just yesterday it was reported that spending for new construction surged 6.9 percent in February—the largest 1-month increase since 1946.

The facts show we are making progress but we must make more. Every person wanting a job should be able to find one; every family needing housing should be able to afford it; and every person needing food should have it. Until these things come to pass, we cannot rest on our laurels.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATTA) has consumed 17 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. SIMON) for 45 minutes.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

I thank the Chairman and I am pleased to speak here for my colleague, Mr. HAWKINS of California, who has been the pioneer in the Humphrey-Hawkins employment field and who will probably be remembered long after most of the rest of us are forgotten for his contributions in this whole field of employment.

I do have some prepared remarks by him, but I have to wait until we are in the full House to have those inserted in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. SIMON. Very well. What we did back a few years ago with the adoption of Humphrey-Hawkins, we said employment and unemployment have to be a much greater priority in this country.

Unfortunately, we have slipped from those days of Humphrey-Hawkins concerns. The February unemployment figures: overall unemployment; 7.8 percent, 8,800,000; adult men, 7 percent; adult women, 6.9 percent; overall unemployment among blacks, 16.2 percent, more than double the overall rate, more than double the rate for both men and women—1,923,000 of our fellow citizens were black who were unemployed. Overall rate of unemployment for teenagers, 19.3 percent. Black teenagers, 43.5 percent.

There are many people in this country, my friends, who are worried about crime; and it is particularly a horrendous problem in the black, Hispanic, central city areas. And one of the reasons is that this Congress and this administration have not had enough vision to provide jobs. You provide jobs for these young people, have an economy where they can have jobs and you will see the crime rate diminish appreciably.

And all of these statistics do not count the discouraged workers, people the Bureau of Labor Statistics does not count because they have run out of unemployment compensation, they are no longer going to the local unemployment office, 1½ million people like that. They do not count involuntary, part-time employment. That is almost 6 million people who are working 2 days a week or 3 days a week who want to be working full time.

And one other aspect of this that we should recognize and that is in the economy as it is today, despite all the statistics, there has been a diminution in the quality of life for a great many people.

We have steelworkers who were working in steel mills, making good money, who are now working as chefs in a fast-food place. And that is another factor that we ought to be weighing as we take a look at where we are.

As we put together the budget the whole idea of Humphrey-Hawkins was as we put together a budget we look at long range what is a sound investment for this country and what is a waste of money. And here we have to face two trend lines.

My colleagues have heard me say this before, but I want to say it again through these remaining months of my service in the House, there are two trend lines that we are ignoring in all of what we are doing and they are fundamental.

One trend line is a declining demand for unskilled labor in our country. The other trend line is a growing pool of unskilled labor in our country. We are putting together budgets and programs basically ignoring those two realities. One of these days we have to face that reality.

We spend less on retraining of workers than any Western democracy, any Western industrialized country.

The other thing that I think we are going to have to face—and my friend from Ohio (Mr. LATTA) was talking about leaf-raking jobs—but the reality is those two trend lines mean that unemployment is going to be, I regret to say, a permanent phenomenon in our society. I would like to believe, and we basically have premised our laws on this belief, that just around the corner somewhere the private sector is going to provide enough jobs so that unemployment is going to disappear for all practical purposes. I believe in the free-enterprise system. I want to encourage as many private-sector jobs as we can possibly have. But the reality is unemployment is here. Permanently.

Since we are not going to let people starve, we have a choice of paying people for doing nothing or paying people for doing something. And it makes infinitely more sense to pay people for doing something. Some of them may be leaf-raking jobs. But we could also be paying people to plant the trees that make the leaves so that we can be cleaning our air through those trees, so that we can be working on soil conservation, for leaves add to topsoil. The great shortage we are going to read about at the end of this century is not going to be a shortage of oil or a shortage of water, it is going to be a shortage of topsoil. Why not pay people who are now unemployed, who want to be working, who are drawing welfare, why not pay them for planting 200 million trees a year? Why not take people who know how to read and write and have them teach the 23 million people who are adult illiterates in our society to read and write? All kinds of constructive things that ought to be done if we used our imagination and if we planned a little.

That is what Humphrey-Hawkins was all about. And I hope one of these days we are going to abide not simply by the letter of the law by having this debate and giving some lip service to it, but I hope we really start recognizing that what Humphrey-Hawkins said was: Unemployment is a disaster for the people; it is a disaster for the Nation. We ought to be planning and projecting so that unemployment is not a scar on the lives of so many of our citizens.

● Mr. HAWKINS. Mr. Chairman, as we begin debate what the proper economic goals and policies of the budget should be, let us remember that we are talking about more than just expenditures, revenues, and balance sheets. The Federal budget is the primary tool the Congress has to implement official national economic policy. It is the vehicle which provides for the health, welfare, and security of our country. The budget signals our national priorities to the citizens of this Nation and to the people of the world.

We are about to decide the economic fate of our country, and yet virtually all the powers that be—my colleagues on the Budget Committee, the media, the business community, the stock market, and even Mr. Volcker over at the Federal Reserve Board who has no business dictating fiscal policy—are stumbling about, trying to use the budget as nothing more than a chopping block.

It has become a document of statistics without priorities; a plan with expediency instead of well-thought-out objectives as its mainstay. Where can we cut? Where can we increase revenues?

It seems to me that we have lost sight of the proper role for the Federal budget. Achieving a balanced budget is not an answer in and of itself; it is a desired objective that will result from coordinated and comprehensive economic policy based on vigorous and balanced growth.

The sham of deficit reduction for deficit reduction's sake is clearly documented. We have had almost 5 years of so-called deficit reduction policies—slashing of domestic programs, tax giveaways, restrictive money—and low and behold the budget deficits facing us today and into the future are the largest in peacetime history.

Let's face it. There is no way to balance the budget when we have a weak economy. The pundits who cheer the current recovery are kidding themselves and playing a cruel hoax on the American public. Despite welcome reductions in unemployment, the 7.8-percent overall unemployment rate in February is still higher than at the beginning of the Reagan recession, almost 3 years ago. Minorities and young people have not yet seen even a hint of economic recovery, with 14.9 and 19.3 percent unemployment, respectively.

Interest rates are at the highest levels in history for the phase of the business cycle. The FED is keeping a tight grip on money-supply growth because it erroneously fears demand-side inflation pressures. The current level of economic growth is below the average of past recoveries, and it is unbalanced, inequitable and not sustainable.

No; the surest road to a balanced Federal budget is not by nitpicking here and chiseling away there, but through the restoration and maintenance of full resource use.

Adequate and balanced economic growth is the way to reduce the deficits, and achieve full employment and price stability, as required by law. During periods of above average economic growth, we have had and can have again budget surpluses. With the economy growing properly, the ratio of Federal outlays to total GNP will decline. With the economy growing properly, we would not have to increase taxes, nor cut vital domestic programs.

It is the rate of real economic growth that determines how well we can service our national needs. With the right policies we can afford to have full utilization of our plants; to employ our citizens in productive and meaningful jobs; to obtain the needed revenues to balance the budget and maintain a strong national defense.

As the Nobel Laureate, Dr. James Tobin has said:

> The economy suffers, . . . from weak markets for goods and services; curtailing any demands, including those of governments and taxpayers, is counter-productive. Interest rates might decline reviving some demands for cars and houses. But could the increase in demand induced by lower interest rates more than compensate for the loss of demand induced by lower spending or higher taxes? And if so, wouldn't such demand push interest rates higher than they originally were? The contradiction exposes the flaw in the orthodox argument. Experience also refutes it. Jobs? vigorous recovery is imperative.

Why then, despite all of this, have we fallen into the trap of focusing on reducing spending and increasing taxes as the primary focus of our economic policy debate? Where did we go wrong?

THE REAL CAUSES OF THE DEFICIT

President Reagan's worn out platitude that the policies of "tax tax and spend spend" have caused the enormous budget deficits currently facing us is not true. The enormous shortfalls are a product of the worst recession since the Great Depression, the inequitable tax cuts enacted in 1981, the inappropriately large defense buildup, and excessive interest rates. In 1979 tax receipts were still growing, although at a diminishing rate, when compared with outlays. However, in 1981, two decisive blows to adequate revenues occurred.

First, overly restrictive fiscal and monetary policy set off a chain reaction in the economy which resulted in the onslaught of the worst recession since the Great Depression. Second, the 1981 Tax Act became law, signaling a full scale assault on needed revenues and tax equity.

THE COSTS OF RECESSION

First, let's talk about the effects recession has had on the deficit.

ECONOMIC COSTS

Deliberately planned recession has consequences in terms of dollars and cents. While the millions of unemployed represent billions of dollars in wasted human productivity and necessary Government transfer payments to aid survival, they also represent billions of dollars in lost tax revenues.

When a person loses his or her job, they necessarily stop paying taxes. Every additional percentage point of unemployment adds $25 billion to $30 billion to the revenue shortfall, due to these lost sources of revenues and to the Government's responsibility to help the unemployed through payments for food, health care, and other basic necessities.

In fiscal year 1983, the recession conservatively cost the Treasury $123 billion in lost revenues and transfer payments.

HUMAN COSTS

While we hear plenty of talk about reducing the red ink of the budget numbers for economic reasons, it seems there is a gross lack of concern for the human deficit that is the result of our misplaced priorities. The human costs of deliberately-imposed recession policies, recently dignified as being noninflationary economic growth, can never be accurately calculated.

How does one compensate for the recession-related stress factors of increased marital discord, broken families, problem drinking, drug abuse, depression, reduced productivity, aggressive behavior within the family which might surface as abuse cases, school dropouts, and other negative and antisocial behavior?

What are we saying about our society and priorities of Government when we shy away from direct action to counter these factors? As Bishop James Rausch, speaking for the U.S. Catholic Conference has said:

> What happens to a nation that begins to accept the notion that it cannot use the talents and labor of its people? What happens to us as a people as we watch families that have made the slow and painful climb up the economic ladder, only to be pushed down again into poverty by the loss of a job?

These human deficits are the basis for a series of potential time bombs that could go off at any time, and pose a far greater risk to our national security and economic well being than budget red ink.

THE COSTS OF THE REAGAN TAX ACT

When we add the effects of the Reagan tax act to the costs of recession, the picture becomes all too clear. The 1981 Tax Act was supposed to increase the means of production. It was argued that less taxation for businesses and the wealthy would result in more investment. However, we are still waiting to see the boom in business investment these incentives were supposed to produce.

The Reagan tax act added to the maldistribution of income and purchasing power. The corporations and high-bracket individuals who benefited the most have done little to add to productive investments.

I do not find it strange at all that United States Steel recently bought out Marathon Oil instead of modernizing its own facilities. I do not find it strange at all that Texaco acquired Getty Oil for $10 billion or that Standard Oil of California is proposing to gobble up Gulf, and Mobil Corp. is positioning for a takeover of Superior Oil. These companies see that they can get away with administering prices and then get all those windfall tax breaks too. Why should not they move full steam ahead with sheer profit motivation? What has the Government done to encourage productive investment? Not a darn thing!

Stimulating private business investment depends not on tax favors, but on expansion of consumption and public outlays—ultimate demand. Businesses need markets for their goods and services.

So, in fiscal year 1982, the first full year of the Reagan tax giveaway, the Treasury lost $38.4 billion; in 1983, despite enactment of TEFRA, the Treasury lost $74.5 billion; the estimate for fiscal year 1984 is $98.2, and the projection for fiscal year 1985 is $125.3.

DEFENSE BUILDUP

Another primary cause of our budget deficits is the Reagan administration's overly zealous defense buildup. I have always been supportive of a strong military budget, but I have never supported throwing money blindly at any national priority, and unfortunately, I believe that is what has happened over the last 3 years with defense spending.

There is a lot of waste and mismanagement in the defense budget, and we need to clean that up. We are depending on expensive, unnecessary weapons far too much, and literally billions of dollars can be saved by just looking at these two aspects of the military budget.

Since Mr. Reagan has come to office, the Federal budget has been hostage to an almost fanatic concern with military priorities, to the unwarranted expense of the domestic needs of our Nation. The administration and many individuals in Congress, however, fail to acknowledge these facts and persist in scapegoating the rightful role of domestic spending in an overall coordinated economic policy.

So, let us set the record straight once and for all. While it is true Government spending as a percent of GNP has reached postwar record levels under the Reagan administration, it is a direct result of the defense buildup, interest payments on the debt, and recession-related expenditures, and not as a result of regular types of domestic spending.

The House Budget Committee staff report of February 1984 points out that between 1980 and 1985, Government spending rises by 1.4 percent of GNP—revenues fall 1.2 percentage points, and the deficit balloons to 4.9 percent of GNP—defense spending rises by 1.7 percentage points and interest payments rise by 1.2 percentage points. Domestic spending, however, falls by 1.5 percentage points of GNP.

Now, the President tell us in his fiscal year 1985 request that 40 percent of the budget cuts he wants should come from domestic programs targeted on low-income individuals and families. He proposes severe cuts in WIC, the program that provides nutrition supplements to low-income pregnant women, infants, and children. And even the latest Republican so-called down payment plan for the deficit earmarks $43 billion in domestic priority program cuts while the defense budget would still have a 7 percent real growth rate.

HIGH INTEREST RATES

Finally, we must factor in the havoc excessively high interest rates has wrought on the budgetary imbalance. High interest rates have put additional burdens on the already massive debt payments which the Federal Government has to make on its obligations.

In addition, high interest rates have imposed serious strains on consumers, farmers, the auto and housing industries, small businesses, and State and local governments. High interest rates muzzle consumer demand, the essential ingredient to a sustained and balanced growing economy. Conventional mortgage rates continue above 13 percent, and consumer loan rates are as high as 19 percent. The current recovery can not possibly be sustained as long as interest rates continue to inhibit the consumer demand and business investment essential to adequate balanced growth.

The deficit reduction plans before us do not comprehensively address underutilized plant and people, inequities of the 1981 Tax Act, the defense buildup and high interest rates.

The window-dressing efforts to forge a downpayment on the deficit, and to merely chisle here and there on spending and revenues programs will not make our economy grow again on a balanced and sustainable basis. It will not bring unemployment down to 4 percent nor achieve price stability, as required by law. I doubt if it will even provide us with a little borrowed time before the next recession slaps us in the face. In short, it is a panacea that takes us away from beginning to undertake the very policies and programs that can put us on the path to adequate balanced growth.

THE FULL EMPLOYMENT ALTERNATIVE

The key to sustainable economic growth is a comprehensive and coordinated plan which eases monetary policy, reorders fiscal policy and targets structural programs to achieving the full utilization of our plant capacity and putting people to work in productive and meaningful endeavors.

In order for any plan to succeed, we must have benchmarks upon which we can judge progress. The Full Employment and Balanced Growth Act requires us to use the reduction of unemployment as the most important benchmark upon which progress is to be measured. The act requires us to pursue policies which will achieve an interim goal of 4 percent unemployment and 3 percent inflation within 5 years. It requires that policies should be geared to reducing unemployment and inflation simultaneously, not through trading off the achievement of one for the other.

In the past, inflation has been tackled through macroeconomic means, instead of through specific sectoral approaches which stop price pressures at their source. The Reagan recession was the most recent example of following a tradeoff policy of restricting overall demand to lower prices. The result, of course, was massive unemployment, ballooning budget deficits and a weaker recovery coming out of the trough of recession.

This chronic problem will not change until we follow an overall plan based on full resource use. We must see through the sham of so-called inflationary fears and expectations which prevents us from pursuing the level of economic growth needed to achieve and then maintain a full-employment economy.

Fears and expectations are intangibles: while they do have some effect on the stock market and on a business person's pricing decisions, they are not the primary inflation culprits. Administered pricing causes inflation; shortsighted energy policy causes inflation; runaway health care costs fuel inflation; a shortage of affordable and decent housing causes prices to escalate; and inequitable and counterproductive farm policy causes inflation.

A tough anti-inflation policy aimed at curtailing price hikes where they originate is part and parcel of an effective growth strategy. We can move ahead with a growth path geared to reducing unemployment to full employment levels without having to worry about inflationary pressures building up if our anti-inflation program is simultaneously put in place.

On a macroeconomic level, we must immediately reduce interest rates and ease the Fed's overly tight control on the supply of money. At the same time, we have to use the budget as our primary tool for reordering fiscal and structural policy.

Despite some improvement in the overall unemployment rate, there is an ever expanding group of Americans who do not possess the necessary skills for employment and have not been able to receive training and find jobs in the private sector. Many young people, minorities, women, and workers displaced by plant closings and the technological revolution look to Government for job and training opportunities.

The Federal Government has the responsibility to help these Americans, the so-called other America, as John Kenneth Galbraith and Michael Harrington have named them. Those who are left in poverty despite general economic progress. Only targeted structural programs which meet the specific labor market problems experienced by these citizens can help them gain and maintain their rightful place in the American labor force.

We must embark on a comprehensive approach to employment policy. We have to adequately fund programs already on the books like the Job Training Partnership Act. The Government must also serve as employer of last resort when the private sector is unable to provide enough jobs for all those able and willing to work.

We have to enact bills such as H.R. 1036, which would put long-term unemployed people to work on needed community repair and services projects. We have to address the special needs of youth, through programs such as H.R. 5017, the Youth Entitlement Act. We have to insure equal opportunity for all Americans through effective and tough enforcement of equal employment opportunity laws and regulations.

As we begin this debate on the first concurrent budget resolution, let us remember what the true purposes of the Federal Budget are. We must reorder our budget priorities so that the needs of our people and the economy are met. As we struggle with the appropriate mixes of domestic programs and defense spending, and tax incentives and revenue enhancements, let us not forget what our goals should be.

Adequate and sustainable growth is the first step needed to achieve full employment and price stability simultaneously. A strong anti-inflation program and targeted structural programs are required to insure that all Americans reap the benefits of strong growth, and that all sectors of the economy prosper in a balanced and coordinated way.

As we debate the resolution, let us not forget that aggregates, assumptions, outlays and budget authority represent more than just cold hard statistics.

We are talking about values, priorities, and human beings, as Bobby Kennedy once said when referring to the gross national product:

> It does not include the beauty of our poetry or the strength of our marriages, the intelligence of our public debate or the integrity of our public officials. It allows neither for the justice in our courts, nor for the justness of our dealings with each other. The gross national product measures neither our wit nor our courage, neither our wisdom nor our learning, neither our compassion nor our devotion to country. It measures everything, in short, except that which makes life worthwhile.●

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New York (Mr. KEMP).

Mr. KEMP. Mr. Chairman, I rise to speak on Humphrey-Hawkins for several reasons, one of which is that I have participated in this debate each year since the passage of Humphrey-Hawkins in, I think, 1978.

Second, because I, like the previous speaker from Illinois (Mr. SIMON), and some members of his party, and an increasing number of members of my party, believe that full employment is not a distant goal or a dream, but is a very distinct possibility if we create the right environment and pursue the right economic policies for all the American people.

One other aspect of the Humphrey-Hawkins debate, I have enjoyed, since 1978 when it passed, was the basic idea that full employment had to be accompanied by stable prices which implies honest money, a predictable value to our currency. In fact, that is in the original Humphrey-Hawkins legislation, full employment with reasonable price stability.

I heard the gentleman from Illinois, a very sincere advocate of Humphrey-Hawkins, talking about putting our country back to work, and about the tragedy of unemployment, and I share both of those sentiments. But he went on to say that rather than have someone out of work, the Government should pay them to work. Now I understand that he has a desire to get people back to work, but let me say that I think how you put them to work—in real, meaningful jobs in the private sector, or dead-end make-work public jobs—is as important to the goal of full employment with price stability as any other single objective.

For instance, one out of every five Americans is working in the public sector of the economy. We wonder why there is a national debt of $1½ trillion. Incidentally, even without a current deficit, it will double in 6 years, at a 12-percent interest rate. We also ought to ask the question, I would say to my friend from Illinois, why are those interest rates so high that it is causing the debt burden to rise and causing the national debt to double every 6 years at 12 percent interest and why are we in Congress allowing the Fed to artificially raise interest rates and threaten this recovery?

We plan, many of us on this side of the aisle, to talk about how to bring down interest rates through a combination of fiscal and monetary policy, to achieve the goal of full employment without inflation. That is our goal. We embrace it.

I can remember my friend, Mr. HAWKINS, from Watts, Calif., a member of the distinguished Black Caucus, speaking about the Humphrey-Hawkins bill. I have high regard for him. I remember in 1978 when he said, unemployment is no answer to inflation. He was right. You could go on to the corollary and say, inflation is no answer to unemployment.

The simultaneous high inflation and high unemployment that this country was suffering in 1978, 1979, and 1980 was slowly, but surely and inexorably making this country poor. And you cannot help the poor when our whole country was becoming poor. This recovery while not complete yet, nor perfect by any stretch of the imagination, is strong and noninflationary, and gives us the first chance in 20 years to move this Nation to full employment. We take additional steps to lower our tax rates on both labor and capital, restore sound honest money, and encourage entrepreneurs in the inner cities.

With all due respect to some of the criticism from both sides of the aisle, it seems to me that the gentleman from Illinois is complaining that the glass is half empty, instead of half full. I would like for a moment to say why I believe we are not only in a strong economic recovery, as identified by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATTA), but that this is the strongest recovery in a noninflationary environment since the early 1960's.

The London Financial Times recently editorialized that there were more jobs created in the United States of America in the past year than have been created in the continent of Europe in the last decade. Four million new jobs in 1983; in the first quarter of 1984, almost a million more new jobs. Indeed, if we keep creating new jobs in 1984 as we did in 1983, that will be another 4 million jobs in 1984. Compare that with the estimates by demographers and economists that there are only going to be 1½ to 2 million new job entrants a year. That means by 1984 year-end and by 1985 we can truly get unemployment down to 6 or 5 or hopefully 4 percent. My goal is a job for every man and woman who needs one.

I do not want to sound Pollyannaish, but I really think we can lick this unemployment problem if we do not make a mistake in policy that will either slow down this recovery or might cause us to go back into another recession.

The way to create full employment, to have more employees—this will shock my friend from Illinois—is not more Government jobs. It is to have more employers. You cannot create employees without creating employers.

Ladies and gentlemen, in 1982, 1983 and the first quarter of 1984, there have been more new enterprises started in America than ever before. I know that there are still problems. I am not standing up and saying that there are not. And I think many of them are attendant to the high interest rate policy which I think are being held artificially high at this point. But the key to getting more employment for America is to get more enterprises started.

Incidentally, more women are starting businesses today than at any time in the history of this country. More minority enterprises were begun in 1983 and 1984 than at any time in the history of this country. We should encourage more of that. We should be encouraging men and women to take their ideas and go out and start a business with them. That is where jobs come from.

David Birch, of MIT, has said, in his great and I think seminal study on the subject, that more than 80 percent of all the new jobs in the United States of America in the last 10 years have been created in businesses with less than 100 employees.

The new ideas, new technology, new jobs do not come from the Fortune 500. New jobs and new ideas and new technology and new products and new services for the consumers of the American economy come from small businesses, begin by individual entrepreneurs, and that means we should be thinking about tax reform, lower tax rates on everybody and lower interest rates through monetary reform based on a gold-backed dollar.

Senator BRADLEY and Representative GEPHARDT have talked about a 30-percent top tax rate. I welcome that. There are a lot of problems in this bill, but we should welcome two Democratic Members of the Congress, Mr. GEPHARDT and Mr. BRADLEY, are talking about bringing the top rate down to 30 percent and use rhetoric about encouraging incentives for saving and investing. Sounds familiar. We brought the top rate from 70 to 50 percent under President Reagan and reduced all other rates by about 25 percent. And, incidentally, the results are very positive and very beneficial. The rich are paying higher taxes today under Ronald Reagan, at lower tax rates, then they were paying under Jimmy Carter when their tax rates were 20 to 30 percent higher. I know that is a shock to some of my friends. But in 1982, what has happened is that by lowering the tax rates, the amount of revenue coming into the Federal Treasury from wealthy Americans with incomes above $100,000 has gone up by 13 percent. Millionaires are paying over 40 percent more income tax revenue to the Federal Government, even though the rates have come down, because we have encouraged investment and savings and entrepreneurship, and we should be going even further. Mr. GEPHARDT and Mr. BRADLEY propose to lower the top rate to 30 percent. Some of us would like to take it down to 25 percent, put on an earned income deduction for the working poor and middle class to take care of men and women who earn their incomes from wages. We should have a 20-percent exclusion for wages, phased out as you earn more than $40,000. Let us raise the exemption for families so that everyone, but especially families with children, can have an opportunity to earn more after-tax-income, and get a fair break.

But we also need to talk about monetary policy. Let me say to those few of us who are here for this historic debate that we must also recognize that ultimately the way to balance the budget, the way to get the deficit down, the way to reduce the interest on the national debt, the way to keep this country's national debt from doubling every 6 years at 12 percent interest, is to undertake monetary reform in this country that can bring our interest rates back to normal—6 percent or 7 percent, or at least single digit levels.

I remember listening to President John F. Kennedy in 1961 stand before the American people. Imagine when the President of the United States puts all of the integrity of his office behind the pledge to protect the value of the currency of the American people. He said, "I pledge to keep the dollar as good as gold;" he pledged to the American people and the people of the world that a dollar as good as gold, would be the financial linchpin of the world trade system.

Imagine what confidence people had in the dollar. We used to say the economy is as "sound as a dollar," and "the dollar is as good as gold." Today you cannot say that, and that loss of confidence, that loss of capacity of this Government to fulfill for the American people the fiduciary responsibility to protect the value of the currency by making it good, sound, honest, stable—a dollar of value that is predictable over a long period of time. That is the key to bringing down interest rates.

I hate to shock my friends who look at this only from a fiscal standpoint, and I know that there will be those who say, "Well, KEMP or WEBER or MACK, DANNEMEYER, or SILJANDER or BETHUNE or MCEWEN, you guys here on the floor are just talking about the good old days."

I say, give me the good old days—the good old days of 4-percent interest rates, 5-percent mortgage interest rates, a national debt one-third of what we have today.

In fact, the last time we balanced the budget the right way was in 1965. Unfortunately, President Kennedy had been tragically assassinated, but his policies of cutting tax rates, protecting the fiduciary value of our dollar, protecting the international monetary system brought that about. President Kennedy also cut the tax rates of the American people by 20 percent, risking a short-term deficit in order to build up investment and savings and working opportunities, so that unemployment dropped from 6 percent to finally 3 percent, interest rates were low, inflation was low, and the budget was virtually balanced in 1965.

Let me say—it took me a long time to get here—if you want to balance the budget, pass the right economic policy. You cannot balance the budget with people out of work and factories operating at less than full capacity. You cannot balance the budget in recession. The key to balancing the budget is to bring the economy to full employment. We should cut spending where necessary, where prudent, where responsible, from defense and the Pentagon, right through every other agency of the Federal Government but in a sound and compassionate manner, not with a meat ax.

But I do not like the idea of a freeze because a freeze implies that some programs ought to be kept at levels which really cannot be defended on their merits. There are some programs of the Federal Government that ought to be abolished or sharply curtailed. We ought to start with the Department of Energy, we ought to start with the Synfuels Corporation, we ought to start with the Eximbank and all those subsidies to major corporations in America which do nothing but provide a welfare system for giant corporations and dramatically reduce or phase out or abolish their subsidies. They do not need welfare, they do not need a safety net, they do not need a floor under which they should not be allowed to fall. The people of this country need a platform under which they should not be allowed to fall, but more than that, they also need a ladder upon which to climb.

That is not original with me, of course not. Perhaps, it was not even original with Winston Churchill, whom I am quoting. It goes back, I guess, to Adam Smith and Jean-Baptiste Say and all those classical economists who believed there were no limits to growth, there was no limit to what free people could do if given the chance.

The greatest revolutionary idea in the history of the world is that when people are free to produce, to save and invest, and have confidence in their future progress, and prosperity take place. Not only is that the most revolutionary idea in history, it really is the only one that has ever worked. No government in history, I would say to my friend from Illinois, has been able to do for people what they have been able to do for themselves when they were free to go out and be enterprising and are able to get a job. The source of new jobs is not the U.S. Government. New jobs in this country will come from a rapidly expanding entrepreneurial climate.

I will say to my friend who was critical of the President, why is he not saying something about urban enterprise zones, which are being held back by his party's leadership, why is he not saying something about getting investment incentives into the inner city so that we can get teenagers and blacks in the ghettoes and Hispanics in the barrios, back to work, why are we not dramatically altering the Tax Code and the investment and job climate in the inner city? It is a social imperative as well as an economic goal.

Let me say parenthetically, the highest individual tax rates faced by the American people are in the inner city. If you are a mother or a dad on welfare and you try to get off welfare and get a job and go to work, the Government takes away your welfare benefits and taxes your income. At $8,000 of nontaxable income, in terms of welfare benefits, when you get a job for $8,000, your after tax gain is roughly zero. That is a 100-percent marginal tax rate on a welfare mother or dad.

We are subsidizing welfare. I believe in a welfare system; you have to have one in a Judeo-Christian society. You need to take care of those who cannot take care of themselves. But, ladies and gentlemen, we are also punishing you if you work, we are punishing you if you save, we are punishing you if you invest. In Japan, you can earn $50,000 tax-free if you save. In the United States we give you a lousy little $2,000 IRA account, but if you ever cash it in and try to spend it for something, we tax you and punish you for having saved in this country.

We should be lowering the tax rates on savings; we should be lowering the tax rate on investment; we should be lowering the tax rate on entrepreneurship; we should be lowering the tax rate on labor.

A lower and flatter tax rate system would lower the cost of labor, while increasing the reward to labor, and would make us more competitive. We do not need an industrial policy where the U.S. Government sets up a Reconstruction Finance Corporation like Herbert Hoover set up in 1931 and 1932. The best industrial policy for this country is sound money; low interest rates; a tax system that encourages capital formation, allows a businessman or woman to invest in new technology and new equipment and new plants and depreciate it over the shorter term instead over a period of time which makes us less competitive than every other industrialized nation on the world. We should lower further the tax rates on working people and the working poor.

The people who want to raise taxes do not favor full employment. You cannot believe in full employment and raise taxes. Taxes are an impediment to growth. Anything that discourages economic growth exacerbates the deficit and keeps unemployment up, and the reason that the budget of the chairman of the Budget Committee (Mr. JONES) is wrong is because it raises taxes and does not do anything about getting unemployment down.

We should be committed to full employment; nothing less. If unemployment is 7.8 percent, as Mr. SIMON says in 1984, we should be committing ourselves right now to bringing it down. You would do more to get the deficit down by getting unemployment down by 1 or 2 points than by all of these tax increases that are being discussed by the Democratic leadership from Mr. MONDALE and Mr. HART with their surtaxes right down to the leadership of the majority party in the House who want to end indexing, end the 3rd year of the tax cut, and to increase every tax they can get their hands on.

People pay taxes and say once again the American people and the people of Buffalo and western New York are not undertaxed, they are overtaxed.

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEMP. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. WEBER. I thank the gentleman for yielding and I apologize for interrupting because the gentleman is delineating a case so carefully.

I just want to make a point since our colleague from Illinois is on the floor. In the gentleman's statement, in essence, he conceded the point of the gentleman from New York. At least to my ears, and I am sure that is not what he necessarily intended, but it really struck me that the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. SIMON) in talking about the problems of employment in the country, and talking about the challenge of the Humphrey-Hawkins Full Employment Act sort of concluded his statement by saying that he was somewhat discouraged by the fact that we came to the floor of the House to debate the Humphrey-Hawkins bill in accordance with the terms of that law, but really look forward to the day when we could actually do something more about fully implementing it.

I tend to agree with the gentleman from Illinois from that standpoint. Now, my district is not an industrial district, and frankly, the problems of unemployment that are acute in the district of the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Illinois are not necessarily the problems in my district.

My district has got other problems. I have got an agricultural district. We are having record numbers of farm sales and foreclosures in my district this year. We are having problems with our businesses on main street in my district this year. That is specifically, acutely, and almost exclusively a monetary policy phenomenon because of the interest rate structure.

Mr. KEMP. Absolutely. Absolutely, I say to my friend from Minnesota. The other day in the New York Times the stock market dropped 11 points and there was a headline in the New York Times financial section saying "Federal Reserve Board Raises Key Interest Rate".

Now you say, ahh-ha, is there a link between markets, such as the stock market, and what is happening on interest rates and bonds? The Federal Reserve Board since 1983 in this very strong recovery became frightened that unemployment was coming down too fast, and that the economy was recovering too fast, so they raised the Federal funds rate from 8.3 to 8.7 to 9.2 to 9.7 and the last time I heard, the Federal funds rate, which is what the member banks of the Federal Reserve charge overnight for the lending money, was 10¾ percent. It has been over 10 percent for almost 3 weeks, and the prime rate is going up in the fact of the deficit coming down.

The deficit is coming down, by the way. Despite all of those doomsayers, all of the gloom and doom, all of the manic obsession with the deficit, it is coming down as the recovery continues. That should be our goal. The Federal Reserve Board should accommodate noninflationary growth to allow this economy to continue to recover.

I would say one other thing: We need to institutionalize a sound monetary standard; we need to give the Fed some institutional guide other than Paul Volcker's own personal little standard, which he is following day-after-day and to which no one else is apparently privy. Right now, we need to tell him, target sound money, target stable prices, whether commodity spot prices, or the price of gold.

The only permanent solution is to assure people over a long period of time that we are not going to inflate or deflate, that we are going to make the dollar once again honest and sound, by guaranteeing it in gold. Interest rates will come down and we can refinance, finance household debt, consumer debt, and the national debt and we can continue reviving housing and autos and steel and rebuild our infrastructure.

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEMP. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. WEBER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The gentleman has made I think a critical point. Chairman Volcker came before committees of this House and testified as we were all clearly aware at the time, that in his judgment if we could reduce the deficit by $50 billion, it would result in a 1-point drop in the prime rate. That is what Volcker said on the record testifying before the House.

Now, as the gentleman from New York has pointed out, because of economic growth, virtually everybody has already reestimated the deficit at a somewhat lower level; as much as $40 billion lower, according to some estimates. But even if that is not the figure, the point is far from coming down, interest rates are going up. What do we have as a Congress to assure us that if we pursue dramatic reductions in the deficit, and I favor doing that, but what assurance do we have that even if we do that, interest rates are going to come down in view of the fact they are now moving in precisely the opposite direction? Should we not be focusing as the gentleman from New York is telling us to, on the whole structure of our monetary policy, lest we find that we are pursuing the wrong solution to the problem that we all agree is keeping this economy from recovering to its fullest capacity?

I thank the gentleman again for yielding.

Mr. KEMP. I thank the gentleman for his comments, and he brings up something that I talked about a little bit earlier, which is the importance of monetary policy in reaching an equilibrium in the budget battle.

I know this shocks some of my more orthodox friends, but I do not see how the deficit could have caused interest to go up in 1979 and 1980 and 1981. Interest rates were higher where the deficit was lower, and vice versa. But if you look back at the history of the Federal funds rate, targeted by the Fed, look at the discount rate which is set by the Fed, in 1979, it went from single digit to double digits when the deficit was the smallest in the last 10 years.

The Federal funds rate was kept at about 15 percent on average for 3 years. What happened is that it killed the housing industry, the auto industry, the steel industry, it caused the collapse in farm prices, it caused the collapse in our agricultural trade policy, and unemployment went from about 6 to 11 percent. According to the CBO, five points of unemployment is at least $150 billion of deficit.

The gentleman from Illinois is right: Get unemployment down, and you will get the deficit down. Yes, we need to cut spending; yes we should be concerned about those out of work; yes we should be concerned about training, and I will join any person on this floor, left, right, or center, in coming up with the right kind of job training.

I have mentioned his name a couple of times. I think it is only fair before I yield to my colleagues on the right, that I yield to Mr. SIMON from Illinois for a question.

Mr. SIMON. I thank my colleague for yielding.

On some things we are in agreement; on some things we are not in agreement. Let me just point out factually, you criticized the Democratic proposal on the budget because of revenue increases. It is $49.8 billion, while the Latta proposal was $47.2. Not much difference between the two.

Mr. KEMP. Let me take back my time long enough to say that there will be another budget alternative proposed by my friend, the gentleman from California (Mr. DANNEMEYER) that has no tax increase and envisions tax reform a la Bradley, Gephardt, Kemp, Kasten, Weber, Walker, Gingrich, Dannemeyer, Mack, et al. We think that we should talk about lowering the rates instead of just taking out loopholes. You could take out lots of loopholes, but you ought to lower the rates at the same time or else it is a tax increase. You ought to lower the rates; make the tax system more simple. Make it fairer. Give the people who are filling out their 1040's a chance to do it by themselves without having to hire a lawyer or an accountant or H&R Block. I have nothing against H&R Block, but it is the fastest growing franchise in America today.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEMP. I again yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SIMON. The one area where we are in agreement is that we ought to encourage as many private sector jobs as we can. But then I think we have to recognize that unemployment is a fairly permanent phenomenon.

Mr. KEMP. There I disagree. There I disagree. This is not a permanent phenomenon. Nothing is permanent unless we make it so.

This economy is going through one of the—I know that this will probably be derided by my friend from Illinois—but it is going through a shedding of its industrial skin as newer technology becomes applied to autos and steel and manufacturing and machine tools. Our best is ahead of us and we can encourage this renaissance by working on further reforms that will make the future even brighter if we have the courage and perspicacity to act correctly.

Mr. ZSCHAU of California, and other members in the high-tech caucus, can blow our minds in telling us about the future of this economy if we encourage new enterprises which create jobs. But those Malthusians who believe that it is all over for America, that we cannot compete, and that we have to husband our shrinking resources and punish our people and go back to living with less, I think they are on the wrong side of the issue, they are on the wrong side of history, they are on the wrong side of the American people.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEMP. I have to give my friend, the gentleman from Florida (Mr. MACK) a chance to speak because he organized this session, then my friend, the gentleman from California (Mr. DANNEMEYER), and then back to the gentleman from Illinios, Mr. SIMON, and then I want to hear the gentleman from New York, Mr. DOWNEY. They are all waiting.

I yield to the gentleman from Florida (Mr. MACK).

Mr. MACK. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, There are a couple of points. One the gentleman from Illinois brought up, where in essence he said it is too bad that we do not really talk about these questions that concern unemployment more often and for longer periods of time. Here we are with what usually is a 4-hour debate on Humphrey-Hawkins that has been cut down to an hour and a half.

Mr. KEMP. And what a shame.

Mr. MACK. I think it is a shame.

Mr. KEMP. I will tell the gentleman, if he could see what I see from standing here, all of the Republican Members standing, waiting, chomping at the bit to get a chance to talk about full employment, and there are only a couple Members of the other party, which used to talk about it, but which mostly is not even here today. I am so proud that there are some of our people who literally want to move this country forward into a new economy and a brighter future.

Mr. MACK. If the gentleman will yield further, the debate really is what happens with economic growth in the country. The question really is: What do we do about employing people?

The other day during one of the budget hearings, I asked the chairman, I said,

> What is the end result? What are we going to say to the American people that we have accomplished because of what we do in our budget work? Are we going to put more Americans back to work? Are we going to reduce interest rates? Are we going to reduce inflation? Are we going to raise to a higher level our economic growth? Are we going to sustain that for a longer period of time?

Do you know what happened? There was almost total silence. When I asked Paul Volcker the question about what level of economic growth could he support for a long period of time, his response basically was somewhere around the numbers that either OMB or the CBO suggested, which are 3.3 percent to 4 percent.

So I asked him the question: What do we have to do in order to raise the level of real economic growth? What do we have to do in order to go to 4½ or 5 or 5½ percent that would satisfy you so that you would not come in and drop the money supply?

He responded and said two things: One thing you have to impact is productivity. The other thing that he talked about doing was that we have to increase the capacity of the country to produce goods and services.

Do my colleagues realize how much time we have spent in the year and a half I have been here talking about how we improve productivity? Exactly zero. No time at all. And yet when we had 4 hours set aside so we could talk about it today, what did we end up with? We ended up with an hour and a half, of which we get 45 minutes to talk about the two most significant things that impact the future of this country.

I want to thank the gentleman for leading this discussion, and I want to add one more thing and then I will allow someone else to talk.

Mr. KEMP. Just to confirm what the gentleman says, the majority party's budget accepts 7.8 percent unemployment throughout 1984. That's where it was in February. That is not good enough for us. I know it is not good enough for this side of the aisle, and it is not good enough for this President. We ought to be committed in this year and next year to bringing unemployment down below 5 percent and to extending this recovery to the inner city as well. We must put all Americans back to work.

Mr. MACK. To conclude one more point, as the gentleman knows, I spent most of my business career in banking, and I came here really with the thought that, yes, it was a good thing to have this total separation between the Federal Reserve and the Federal Government or those of us in Congress. But the one thing that has become so obvious to me after spending roughly 1 year and 3 or 4 months in the Committee on the Budget is that we have to have a coordination between what we do with fiscal policy and what we do with monetary policy.

Again, I appreciate the comments that the gentleman made earlier. We have got to continue the thrust, and I would suggest that maybe what the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Illinois and myself ought to do is get together and find out how we can put together more time, more discussion, more debate about the two most important things that affect the countries' economic growth-increasing productivity and our ability to produce by expanding the capacity of our plant and equipment.

Mr. KEMP. I appreciate the gentleman's comments. He made a very good point: There is no reason why the interest rates have to be this high at this point in the recovery. The idea that economic growth causes inflation, and that inflation is caused by too many people working, is rediculous. Inflation is not caused by too many people working. We have had full employment without inflation in the past, and we can do it again.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEMP. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I commend the gentleman for putting this whole issue of a discussion of reducing the deficit in the perspective that it belongs; namely, that we make a mistake by contending that it is only a phenomenon of fiscal irresponsibility that brings us to this problem. It is a monetary problem as well.

I do not want to go on at length, but just think for a moment, or ask the question: At what rate could the U.S. Government sell its debt instruments up until 1971, since the Second World War? The answer: 3 percent. That is when we had the dollar tied to gold.

Mr. KEMP. Grandfathers had railroad bonds that had been floated for 100 years, and it was 3½ or 3¾ percent—100 years. This Nation was built on sound money, honest dollars, and faith in the future.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. As the gentleman knows, the third highest item in the budget today is interest on the national debt, currently about $120 billion a year. That is because we are paying about a 10-percent annual rate of interest on the debt. One does not have to be a college graduate to figure out that if we could sell debt instruments at 3 percent rather than 10, we would save 7 points off that annual interest expense. Taking 7 points annually off the interest expense would reduce that deficit, the annual operating deficit, by close to $100 billion a year.

That is one of the benefits that we get by having honest money, a dollar backed by gold for America and the Western World.

Mr. KEMP. Imagine what would happen to housing, agriculture, autos, steel, and our trade position if interest rates were at their historical norm, 5, 6, or 7 percent. Imagine this country's ability to produce and increase industrial capacity to be competitive in world markets, if interest rates were at a level at which we could finance future investment with something other than just short-term debt instruments; if we had a long-term bond market and a stronger stock market for equity, and retained earnings higher than even today.

But the recovery plus continued cuts in spending are the greatest way to bring down the deficit.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEMP. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I just wanted to make the point, after hearing someone a few moments ago suggest that we have to accept high unemployment for a period of time. I have seen that suggested in numerous articles and by numerous people in recent months, and it strikes me as being a terribly pessimistic view of our future, particularly when one looks at what can happen in the country.

We do not have to accept 6 percent unemployment as being a full employment kind of situation; neither do we have to accept 5 percent. In the largest county in my district, last month we had gone down to 4.2 percent in unemployment in a State where the unemployment rates are very, very high. Why? Because there is an element of productivity in the economy there; there is diversity in the economy.

In other words, if we accept the kinds of levels that some people around here would like to talk about as being full employment levels, then the very experience of the bulk of my constituents is not relevant. I say it is very relevant. I think that we can bring down unemployment tremendously in this country, and I thank the gentleman for pointing out some of the ways in which we can do that.

Mr. BETHUNE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEMP. I yield to my friend and colleague, the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. BETHUNE. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I rather expect this will be the only discussion of this sort in the entirety of the budget deliberations on the floor today and tomorrow. The difference in the discussion that is taking place here is that we are focusing on growth and prosperity and what that does for the U.S. budget.

In other words, we are driven by the fact that we believe that the economy drives the budget, rather than the budget driving the economy. We realize that for every 1 percent reduction in the unemployment rate, we get a $30 billion reduction in the deficit numbers.

The problem with every other discussion that will take place on the floor here is that the Members are trapped by their own economic assumptions that are faulty, have proven faulty. They are relying on data and opinions given them by people who have missed the target repeatedly in the last 3 years. Therefore, they are trapped and frozen into a way of thinking that precludes any discussion of growth and prosperity and the American enterprise system, economic freedom. So the other discussions that are going to take place here are going to sound like a class in bookkeeping.

It is going to be an exercise in bookkeeping. It is going to be a discussion of whether we have got to either raise taxes this much or reduce spending this much, and that is the only way we can solve the budget question in this country. And that is flawed. That is to misunderstand the nature, first of all, of our job here.

We are not bookkeepers. We are trying to fashion a policy that will stimulate growth and prosperity and stimulate the incentives. So we are talking here about economic freedom and what that can do.

Now, if others want to engage in the discussion here and talk about a national industrial policy and what that will do to create jobs, then we ought to get into that subject and let us hear what they have to say about that. But we happen to believe the fundamental principles of economic freedom will give us the growth and the prosperity that we need to reduce the deficit, and that is what this discussion ought to be about.

Mr. KEMP. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman just really touched a responsive chord in my heart. I was thinking about an article I saw the other day where the New York financial wizards underpredicted the impact of the recovery on the New York State financial situation. They predicted a very small recovery, and expected a deficit for 1984, and now their revenues have risen so high from sales taxes and income taxes that New York State's fiscal condition is far better than it has ever been. It is in surplus by several hundred million dollars.

In California they used to have a billion-dollar deficit. Now, as I recently saw in a story in the Los Angeles Times, they have a surplus of $1½ billion because of the recovery and the impact upon sales taxes, franchise taxes, revenue taxes, and income taxes. Incidentally, there is a total $50 billion surplus at the State and local level.

The Federal deficit is running at about $150 billion—far below official predictions, according to private forecasters—and if you take the recovery in the first quarter of this year and extrapolate it out over or extend it out over the rest of this year, our combined Government deficit by the end of 1985 will be 2 to 2½ percent of GNP; which is bad, but it is not so bad that we ought to panic and raise taxes and tell Paul Volcker to continue the interest rate policy he is following at the Federal Reserve.

Mr. MCEWEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEMP. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. MCEWEN. I appreciate the tack that the debate is taking just now. When we do something correctly, we should look at the RECORD to remember what took place when we were considering it.

Just within the last day or so I happened to look at one of my original newsletters that we sent out in the summer of 1981. In that letter we talked at that time about this topic today. I would like to just run through some quick figures. Savings in 1980 were less than 3 percent of disposable income; productivity was in a 2½ percent decline; inflation was at 18 percent for the first quarter of 1981; interest rates were at 22½ percent.

We made some changes in 1981. One of those changes that we made, as I predicted in my newsletter of July 1981, was that these new changes would double savings because of the IRA's and inheritance tax improvements and the rest. In all actuality, it has increased nearly 300 percent to 8 percent of disposable income. Productivity has gone from a 2½ percent decline in 1980 to 7.2 percent for the first quarter of this year. Inflation has dropped, as we know, to a 17-year low. Interest rates are less than half. But the most important thing, as I said in bold print in this newsletter in the summer of 1981, was that the changes would not only increase employment but would decrease unemployment by creating over 3 million new jobs.

Do the Members know what the London Financial Times editorial said last month?

And as a result we said that we hoped we could create 3 million new jobs, but now we understand we have created 5 million new jobs.

The same people who stood on the sidelines and said, "Increase taxes, increase regulations, have more government programs and higher tax rates, and these things are going to be the solution for America." These people have been wrong consistently. I think it is appropriate now, 38 months later, to look at the record and see where we are headed and see whether or not we should go back to the old policies of tax increases and stagflation or whether we pursue growth, prosperity, investment, savings for the future of America.

Mr. KEMP. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. MCEWEN) for his great contribution.

Mr. Chairman, we have about 6 or 7 minutes on our side remaining, so we will reserve our time now and allow our friends on the other side to proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. SIMON).

Mr. SIMON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 3 minutes, and then I will yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. DOWNEY).

I take this time simply to respond briefly, since my name has been used here, relative to a few matters.

No. 1, let me quote Milton Friedman in Tuesday's New York Times. Milton Friedman does not happen to be a Democrat. Milton Friedman said this:

> The rate of monetary growth over the past two years explains why the declaration of victory in the war against inflation is premature. Over those two years, monetary growth jumped to 9.5 percent—higher than in any other two-year period since at least the end of World War II. Higher inflation is sure to follow.
> The early signs are already here. Consumer prices rose at the rate of 3.3 percent in the first half of 1983 and 4.8 percent in the second half; and of 5.5 percent in the first two months of 1984. Other broad price indexes show a similar pattern. We shall be fortunate indeed if prices are not rising in the 7 to 10 percent range by the fourth quarter of the year and in double digits by 1985.

We are creating a villian in Paul Volcker rather than pointing the finger at ourselves. The primary problem is fiscal policy, not monetary policy.

The second point I want to make before I yield time to my friend, the gentleman from New York, is this: The gentleman from Arkansas (Mr. BETHUNE) says correctly that "some phony economic assumptions have been made." One of those was made by my good friends on the other side of the aisle in 1981 when they said that if we passed their tax bill, by 1984 we would have a balanced budget. I remember those ringing words, and they sounded great. But we know what has happened.

I do not say that this Nation is not going to grow. I agree with my colleague, the gentleman from New York (Mr. KEMP) on that. We are going to experience tremendous growth, but unless we change policies, there are going to be people who are going to be hurt, and hurt badly, in the process of that growth, because those two trend lines I talked about earlier are still here. One is the declining demand for unskilled labor, and the other is the growing pool of unskilled labor.

What I say is simply this: Let us grow. Let us do everything we can to have growth. Let us get the jobs in the private sector, but as we see engineers and architects and computer operators at work, let us not forget the people who have a hard time reading and writing the English language. Let us not forget a lot of others who are in misery in our society. I am afraid that is what we are doing, and we are not creating a better society in the process.

Mr. Chairman, I now yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. DOWNEY).

Mr. DOWNEY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time, and first I just want to say to anybody who thinks for a moment that the Republican Party is not a party of ideas and intellectual ferment: If they had listened to this debate, they would know that that is not true. Rarely have I heard the London Times quoted so often as I have today. Not only do they read the London Times but soon, I am sure, we will hear quotes from the Manchester Guardian.

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWNEY of New York. No; not the Manchester Guardian.

Mr. Chairman, let me yield later, if I may.

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Chairman, I just wanted to say it was the Financial Times that was quoted.

Mr. DOWNEY of New York. The Financial Times. I am sorry, it was the Financial Times.

Mr. Chairman, the debate on Humphrey-Hawkins gives us a marvelous opportunity to talk for a few minutes—and I agree with my friends on the Republican side, it is too few minutes—on the question of the social contract, because it is indeed something that we do not examine and we should examine. And I think the gentleman from Arkansas (Mr. BETHUNE) has put his finger very squarely on one of the concerns. We really do become bookkeepers. We really talk in terms of numbers, and we do not step back and take a look at the policy implications of the things we want to do and where we want to head, both economically and socially.

This affords us that opportunity. The Founding Fathers—and we often talk about them—laid out in the Preamble to the Constitution the notion that establishing justice and insuring domestic tranquility were among the two most important things they wanted to do. They also wanted to provide for the common defense and promote the general welfare. Since President Roosevelt in 1933, it has been axiomatic that the Government of the United States has a role, an important role, to play in our economic development. One of the debates that we have had between Democrats and Republicans is: What should the nature of that Government role be?

Traditionally, Democrats want it to be greater than do Republicans, and that really has not changed. But there have been a number of important warning signs that should allow us to step back and realistically assess what the role of our Government should be in this question of the social contract.

I think we all want full employment. That goes without saying.

We also understand that full employment provides us a number of things that are incredibly valuable to us as a society. If we all grow together, the likelihood is that more people will feel part of this country, enfranchised by it. Crime will probably go down. We will have generation after generation of Americans who will be hopeful and more productive. So the notion of full employment is important and critical to this whole question of the social contract.

If we take a look at full employment and listen to the words of the gentleman from Illinois, we realize there are a number of things that are happening to our country that are inevitable and inexorable.

Demographically, we are changing. The largest portion of people, the largest population cohort now is people over the age of 65. Clearly, most are not going to work, and we are going to have to deal with that problem in terms of the cost of health care.

We have, despite this very vibrant recovery, another nagging problem, and that problem is that more and more Americans are poor, falling below an artificial line we have established the poverty line.

More and more black and Hispanic members are not working; much fewer, I might add, than have not worked in the past, but still the statistics are alarming, particularly for black teenagers. Jesse Jackson's campaign has taught us all something. He has spoken to the hopes and the aspirations of the people of his race and other minorities, and said that they must be part of the American growth process. What Jackson has said, and I think he has said it eloquently, is that the idea that you can have a Government stand off to the side and say, "Private enterprise will care for you. You needn't worry. As long as we grow, you will be taken care of," is not believed by minority people in this country. Whether it is true or not, and I would argue that it is not. They do not believe it. They take a look, as the gentleman from Illinois has so capably pointed out, and see that in an economy where we are increasingly skilled, increasingly more high technology oriented, where robotics is going to play an ever greater role in the manufacture of items, that the skilled and unskilled jobs that were there in the past will no longer be there. They see that many millions of Americans will be left out in the cold regardless of the recovery.

Here it is important for us to recognize the Government's role in providing opportunities and help for these people.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. DOWNEY).

Mr. DOWNEY of New York. It seems to me we should be mindful of the importance of properly targeted training programs and public works programs and public jobs programs, if need be.

We cannot be a nation that has certain people recovering faster than others. We cannot be a nation that tolerates 40 and 50 percentage points unemployment for black and Hispanic youth during a recovery. The role for Government speaks loudly from the mountain tops, and if we dismiss that sound and these warning signs, we will see the following things happen:

We will continue to be a country that is becoming richer and poorer at the same time. We will see crime continue to rise because the people who are permanently left out of the American common weal do not feelpart of it and do not feel part of the social fabric that they inherited, because their portion of the social fabric will have been torn from them.

So the Humphrey-Hawkins debate is a debate about full employment. It is a debate about the opportunities for all our people. All I would suggest to my colleagues on the Republican side and to my Democratic friends is to understand the critical role in a Capitalist economy that the social contract of Government intervention must play. It means that we have to be vibrant. We have to be creative, but we must have a Government role.

The gentleman has pointed out the demographics and I hope that as the debate continues we will understand more clearly the critical role that the National government plays in making all our citizens feel part of this great country.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentlewoman from Ohio (Ms. KAPTUR).

Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Chairman, the debate on the fiscal year 1985 budget properly focuses on the level of the deficit reduction and the manner in which the reductions would be carried out. It is critical that we act responsibly to adopt an equitable budget plan to address the burgeoning deficit. It is time that Congress and the President quit playing lipservice to a deficit which threatens our short-term economic progress and has irresponsibly mortgaged our children's future. Yet because of this administration's insensitivity to the problems of American workers, another issue of paramount national concern has not received the attention on the public agenda that it requires. That is the issue of full employment.

The Humphrey-Hawkins Act attempts to insure that the goals of Government never stray too far from the objectives of full employment and balanced, sustainable growth. Because of the requirement of Humphrey-Hawkins, we have the opportunity to discuss full employment and how well Government policies are working toward that objective. Thankfully due to Federal Reserve actions over 1 year ago, a drop in world oil prices, and consumer spending, we are now in the midst of an economic recovery, and employment is on the upswing.

But progress depends on where you start from. And progress in this administration started from an economy they grounded to a halt. In that perspective, the employment record of this administration can only be judged a failure. Under this President, an average of 3 million more people have been out of work than under the prior administration. Moreover, twice as many new jobs were created in the last administration as in this one. We seem to be left in each recent business upswing with higher and higher levels of what has been termed "acceptable unemployment." Acceptable used to mean 4 percent out of work, then it was 6 percent, now they tell us it is 7 percent.

Furthermore, before we applaud the present 7.8-percent unemployment rate as compared to the 10.8-percent rate which the administration's policies brought on, let us consider what kind of employment level is actually acceptable. Should we be satisfied that today some 9 million Americans are unemployed, another 1½ million are so discouraged they have given up their job search, and roughly 6 million Americans are working part time because they cannot find a full-time job? Sixteen million unemployed and underemployed Americans is unacceptable. We can and must do better. The Humphrey-Hawkins bill set a goal of a 4-percent overall unemployment rate in 1983. It is within the context of that goal that we must judge the employment record of the Reagan administration.

Another objective of the Humphrey-Hawkins bill that demands consideration is its pledge to focus on the employment problems of women. We must recognize the importance of women in the work force, the uniqueness of their employment problems, and fashion Government policies accordingly. The increased participation of women in the work force. Women now constitute 43 percent of the labor force.

Women who maintain families have been especially hard hit in recent years. Their unemployment rate remains at double digit levels: In February the rate was 11 percent. So women who need jobs the most often cannot find them. But the issue of women's employment extends beyond having jobs to the nature of the jobs themselves and the compensation received.

The principle of equal pay for equal work must be upheld. Currently, women do not receive equitable compensation in two types of cases. First, and most blatantly, women performing the same work as men do not always receive the same compensation. Second, women are often underpaid because the occupations they work in are underpaid relative to other occupations. This wage differential is not based on differences in productivity. As a district court in Washington found last year, female State employees were paid less than men even though their jobs required similar skill, effort, responsibility, and working conditions.

The net result is a substantial wage differential. Women wages average about 62 percent of wages for men. Serious problems accompany these lower wages. The trend toward the feminization of poverty is due not only to the previously mentioned difficulty of female heads of households in finding jobs, but also due to low wages. Many women work full time but they and their families, nevertheless, remain poor.

We also must examine the effects on women of our country's industrial policies. Women have an important stake in the industrial policy debate because they are especially vulnerable to job displacement caused by international competition or automation. International competition and automation, for example, have led to the loss of 150,000 jobs in the textile industry. Sixty-two percent of textile workers are women. More generally, women often occupy the office jobs which will be automated in the office of the future.

Sound industrial policies are essential to help women and they are also central to overall job stability and generation. Discussion of our country's industrial policies best begins with a brief outline of the powerful array of current U.S. Government industrial policies used to influence the marketplace. The Federal role in the economy is staggering. It includes over $500 billion in outstanding loans and loan guarantees: Preferential tax treatment of industries amounting to $40 billion per year, and purchases from the private sector of some $50 billion per year. These enormous dollar outlays are only part of the story. The Government influences particular industries through trade, antitrust, and regulatory laws as well.

Better designed industrial policies would work toward the objective of full employment in a number of ways. First, they would help solve the problems caused by our enormous trade deficits. As recently as 1975, the U.S. had a positive merchandise trade balance. This year we can expect to run a trade deficit of more than $100 billion. In traditional industries such as consumer electronics, autos, steel, and machine tools, there were almost no foreign imports in 1960. Since then, our consumer electronics industry has been basically wiped out by foreign imports. In the other three industries, over 25 percent of the American market now consists of imports. At the least, policies need to be implemented which ease the employment transition process that is occurring because of this huge jump in imports.

Second, a better designed industrial policy would consider the regional impacts of changes in our economy. The declining competitive position of American industries and the resulting unemployment are painfully evident in areas such as my Ohio Congressional District. The unemployment rate in the Toledo area remains far above the national average, and the local economic recovery depends on the precarious health of the auto industry. Most disheartening of all is the plight of the thousands of dislocated workers. They have worked long and hard for themselves, their families, and this country, but the jobs they lost will not return, and they do not know what to do. Many of them are forced to seek general relief to keep house and home together.

Third, under a better designed industrial policy, the Government would demand quid pro quos in return for any aid it allocates to business. For example, in response to a plea by Harley-Davidson, Uncle Sam slapped a more than tenfold increase in tariffs on imported heavyweight motorcycles. What did Harley-Davidson do in return for this market windfall? Nothing. It made no commitments toward innovation or product improvement. One other assurance was conspicuously absent: The future employment of Harley's workers. If the Government is going to lend a hand to business, there must be an assurance in return that the employees involved will also benefit.

In closing, I would like to thank Chairman HAWKINS and Mr. SIMON for allowing me to participate in this debate mandated under Humphrey-Hawkins and to discuss the goal of full and adequate employment. Humphrey-Hawkins outlines many laudable objectives, including the need to focus Government policies on the employment problems faced by women workers.

Congress must work toward the objective of full employment for women. It is also essential that we adopt improved industrial policies to whittle down our country's serious structural unemployment problems and stop the erosion of our industrial base and export of jobs to foreign countries.

Government clearly needs to go beyond deficit reduction to achieve the goals of Humphrey-Hawkins.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. BONIOR).

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I just have a question that I would like to address to my colleague from New York (Mr. KEMP). I was sitting and listening to the debate, and a little earlier I was rather struck by one statistic the gentleman gave. I was wondering if the gentleman could elaborate on it.

You mentioned that more jobs, I believe this is what you said, more jobs were created in the past year than were created in Europe in the last decade. I am just wondering where you got that statistic. If it is true, if it is indeed an accurate statistic, it is quite remarkable.

Mr. KEMP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KEMP. It is remarkable. I am glad the gentleman brought it up. It was a quote from the London Financial Times that said, in talking about the recovery in the United States juxtaposed against the lack of a recovery in Europe, that the United States' recovery in the last year has produced more jobs than have been created in Europe in the last 10 years. Then when you find out how many jobs were created in the United States in 1983, you come to over 4 million, and I was simply alluding to the fact that if we could keep creating lots of new jobs in the private sector we could meet the goal that all of us share, which is full employment.

I will say this: There is still unemployment, but among auto workers it has dropped. Steel is still in trouble and there is much to be done. But we should not do anything here on the floor of the House that will stop or slow down this recovery.

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. KEMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

I would just briefly say something to my friend from Illinois, who referred to Milton Friedman, who could be called the godfather of conservative economics and a great free marketeer, and someone for whom I have high regard. Yet, Milton Friedman predicted double-digit inflation last year based on previously high money growth rates, and then predicted there would be no recovery in 1984. He predicted the first quarter as a recession.

You cannot predict a recovery simply looking at how many angels are dancing on the head of M1, as some economists attempt to do.

Mr. HILER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEMP. I would like to yield to my friend from Indiana, Mr. HILER, the radical tax cutter and my good friend.

Mr. HILER. I thank the gentleman for yielding and I suppose for that title.

One of the things that sometimes it is easy to do is to forget just what things were like in 1979 and 1980 before we started to advance policies of lower taxation and some restraint on Government spending.

I got some headlines out of the national newspapers. Here is one from the Wall Street Journal: "Auto sales daily rate in April plunged nearly 27 percent—rivals depth of '75 slump."

I believe now we have the highest sales since the record years of around 1978 and 1979.

Also this headline: "Joblessness darkens outlook for the economy." This is also from the Wall Street Journal.

As the gentleman mentioned, we created almost 5 million new jobs since that time.

Here, from the Wall Street Journal, it says: "Building outlays tumbled by 5.8 percent during March." Contrast that with almost 18 consecutive months of positive news.

Here is another one: "Key index," and they are talking about the index of leading economic indicators, "plunged for March. Factory orders down sharply." Once again, 18 consecutive months of upbeat news.

"Mortgage rates jumped in March to another high. Feds' action cited for rise to 14.6 percent," and on and on and on.

The fact of the matter is that the kinds of policies of a fair Tax Code, and to try to bring some stability to our monetary supply, which we have so far to go, that is the best thing we can do to achieve full employment with low inflation.

I do not know whether full employment is at 4 percent or 5 percent or 3 percent, but it is our job to insure that we get the unemployment rate as low as is humanly possible consistent with low inflation, and that is going to take constructive tax policy and it is going to take some reform of the Federal monetary system.

Mr. KEMP. The problem with our tax system, as everybody knows, is it attempts to redistribute the wealth of our Nation rather than encouraging the wealth of our Nation. We need a tax system that does not make the rich poorer; we need a tax system that allows the poor to get rich. That means lower rates and protection for the working poor.

Incidentally, the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. SIMON, said that the tax cut is what causes big deficits. Ladies and gentleman, tax revenues as a percent of GNP are 19 percent. That is the average revenue base of this country for the past 20 years. Since 1960, it has been right around 19 percent and it is still there. What has gone up is spending.

Mr. ZSCHAU. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEMP. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. ZSCHAU. I thank the gentleman for yielding. I just want to commend the gentleman from New York for his leadership in this debate. He has focused the issue of employment where it belongs, on the private sector.

I come from the Silicon Valley. I had the opportunity to build a company from scratch. I know where jobs come from. They do not come from Government job programs; they come from people taking risks, investors who are willing to back entrepreneurs, inventors, engineers. These are the people that create the jobs in this country.

If we want to perpetuate that, we have to understand whose responsibility it is then to create jobs in this country. It is not Government's responsibility. It is not central planning boards and it is not reconstruction finance corporations.

It is the individuals, the entrepreneurs, the risk takers, the engineers, the innovators. They are the job-creating engines in this country.

I want to commend the gentleman from New York for making that point. It is the essential point in the employment debate.

Mr. KEMP. I appreciate that compliment very much.

We have a plant in my district that lost its color television market to Japan in 1965. They are now back in business producing auto parts for auto engines for Detroit. They are using some of those silicon chips that are produced in either Massachusetts or California.

The plant is more competitive, wages are higher, pension benefits are better. The plant is cleaner and it is expanding, and it is competitive in world markets. Indeed, some of our American autos are more competitive with anything in the world market today. More needs to be done for U.S. industrial competitions, but higher taxes and higher interest rates are not the answer.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEMP. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. GINGRICH. I want to commend the gentleman from New York. I think when you look back to the earlier years when you began to talk about growth and supply side and the chance to create jobs, none of us would have imagined in the mid-1970's that we could have a Humphrey-Hawkins debate with more Republicans on the floor talking about jobs and growth and opportunity, and the change for a better America, and with the Democrats, except for the faithful standardbearers who have always carried the flag, all of the rest of the Democratic Party is hidden. And I think there is a reason for that.

The fact is that there is no intellectually sound case to be made for leftwing policies in America and the fact is that Jimmy Carter and Walter Mondale failed, that it was a total disaster, such a disaster that the American people repudiated it in 1980; such a disaster that as late as last night, voters in New York State, having voted for Mondale in the primary, were telling the exit poll they intend to vote for Ronald Reagan; such a disaster that, in fact, for the first time in my lifetime, the American people are actively returning to a belief that they can help themsleves, that they can create jobs, and that raising taxes and crushing take-home pay is a lousy Government policy.

I just want to commend the gentleman from New York who has played a major role in establishing an intellectual revolution in the House of Representatives.

Mr. KEMP. I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York (Mr. KEMP) has expired.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. SIMON). The gentleman from Illinois has 18 minutes remaining.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume, and I shall not consume all my time.

Mr. HEFNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMON. I am pleased to yield to my friend, the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. HEFNER. I am looking at some numbers here and I do not wish to get into a philosophical argument or a political argument, but we have thrown some numbers around about unemployment, which is what we are talking about.

During the Carter administration, which I am not here to condemn or defend the Carter administration or to be particularly partisan, but under the Carter administration from 1977 to 1980 there were 6,742,000 people unemployed. Under the Reagan administration, 1981 through 1983, there were 9,088,000 people unemployed, and that was for an average unemployment rate under the Carter administration of 6.5 average rate and 9 point average rate under the Reagan administration.

So there is a lot of comparisons if you want to make comparisons. What we are here today to talk about is to try to come up with a budget that cuts $192 billion projected President's budget that I understand we are even having difficulty getting people to offer the President's budget that was sent up here.

So, if you want to look at numbers, look at automobile sales; using the President's projections for the remainder of this year, you are going to sell like 3 million less automobiles than you did in the Carter administration and unless you have 3 million housing starts this year you are going to build less houses in this Reagan administration than you did the Carter administration.

So there is a lot of things here if you want to draw comparisons. And incidentally these numbers on unemployment come from the Bureau of Labor Statistics from the Labor Department.

So let us be fair in our argument. We are talking about coming today to vote on starting on seven different budgets to try to get to a down payment of somewhere in the neighborhood of $150 billion of deficits. Now, the administration wants to take all the credit for bringing down inflation, which, God knows, everybody is happy that inflation is down, but you have to accept some of the responsibility for projecting $192 billions of deficits.

So you just cannot have it both ways. You cannot take credit for all the good and blame somebody else for the bad. And I think it is just a little bit intellectually dishonest to talk about some of these numbers.

I yield back to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SIMON. I thank my friend.

Mr. Chairman, I have some remarks and if we have time I will be happy to yield after my remarks.

One of my friends over here said he started a business and it went well, and that is what the whole American system is all about. And I am all for that. I was involved in starting a business. I was president of four small corporations. I want to encourage that.

But what we have failed to recognize, what this administration particularly has failed to recognize, is that there are a lot of people falling between the cracks. A lot of people who do not have the skills to be employed at Silicon Valley.

I understand the President on occasion—and I have never been there, but I hear about this, some of those on that side of the aisle probably get these invitations more often than we do on this side of the aisle—the President held up the Sunday Washington Post and says, "Look at all the jobs; anyone who really wants a job can get a job."

I took the Sunday Washington Post one Sunday and I like to believe I am reasonably competent, and I went through there. You know, I am not an engineer; I am not a computer operator; I can type, but none of you would ever hire me as a secretary. I cannot fill 95 percent of those jobs.

What do you do if you are 55 years old and all you have done is work in a coal mine, or in a steel mill? What do you do if you cannot read and write the English language? There are a lot of people who do not fit into those comfortable, available job categories. And these are the people I think we ought to be concerned about as a nation.

It is not enough to say the free enterprise system is going to solve the problems. The reality is there are a great many people falling between the cracks and a government that does not pay attention to those people falling between the cracks, is not doing what it ought to be doing.

Let me give you two examples: In a little town of Elizabethtown in my district, I had open office hours and a man named Ervin Price and his wife came in. They have three children; 15, 13, and 10. He said he was desperate for a job; unemployment benefits had run out. He was on welfare.

I said, "If I can get you a part-time job in Harrisburg about 30 miles away, could you get there?" He said, "I would hitchhike." He said, "The tires on my car are so bad I don't know if I can make it home."

It happened to be a cold day when I was there. I said, "How do you heat your place?" He said, "We bought an old-fashioned wood stove and my wife and kids and I walk along the highway and pick up wood."

Now that is real life for real people in the year 1984.

After Ed Meese made his comment about hunger in this country, I went to the Pacific Garden Mission in Chicago, downtown Chicago, and I went into the soup kitchen, talked to some of the men there. When I came out there was a young man, Jim Drane, opening the door for people and sweeping and doing some odds and ends, and he said, "Do you think you could get a job for me anywhere?" I said, "Are you getting paid for what you are doing here?" He said, "They are giving me room and board and $40 a month and I have a wife and two children to support." He said, "I can't do it."

Now, those are real people. And those statistics we hear about 8 million people, 10 million people, and represented by Jim Drane and Ervin Price. And somehow we have forgotten these people.

The real difference in our society, in my opinion, is not between the black and white, not between Hispanics and Anglos, not between rich and poor. The real difference in our society is between those who have hope and those who have given up.

And the two things that can give that spark of hope to people are, No. 1, seeing that their children can have a quality education, that there is hope for the future; and second having a job.

And we are not paying enough attention to that latter part. We are not paying enough attention to the former, either.

In all the statistics that have been bandied about here, one thing was not mentioned; and that is, there is a shrinking middle class in this country; not a healthy thing.

One of the things that keeps our country stable is that we do not have too many who are very rich, and too many who are very poor. What has been happening in the last few years is that the number of the poor has been growing; a few more have been added to the numbers of the rich, and many more are poor. It is a problem we are going to face in our society either through crime rates or through constructive programs.

Two statistics that interest me that I noticed the other day. They are not directly related but they say where we are going in our society.

We have 3 million fewer young people in our schools getting school lunches than we did 3 years ago.

And we are selling three times as many Jaguars as we did 3 years ago.

I am troubled by those kind of statistics. I hope our discussion on Humphrey-Hawkins can move us in a more constructive direction. I have the feeling, listening to my friend from New York (Mr. KEMP), that if enough of us sat down on both sides of the aisle and recognized, No. 1, we want to encourage as many private sector jobs as possible, and I think all of us agree on that, and No. 2, that where people cannot get private sector jobs, that we have to find something more constructive than just telling them, "You go home and we are going to send you a check."

That seems to me not in their interest nor in the interest of the taxpayers. Yet, that is where we are in our society today.

My hope is that one of these days we will do more than simply have a few minutes of discussion on Humphrey-Hawkins but really start looking at some of the fundamental problems and the sooner we look at the problems the sooner we are going to come up with answers; not in a partisan, bickering way—all of us are guilty of being a little too partisan now and then. But we must ask: What can we do in a constructive way to build a better society?

Mr. MCEWEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMON. I yield to my friend from Ohio.

Mr. MCEWEN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I have the utmost respect for my friend and I appreciate his compassion, his caring and I appreciate his directing the debate in precisely that manner.

But as I begin my brief minute, if I may respond to the gentleman from North Carolina, who raised some issues and some figures that may be misunderstood by those observing this debate here today.

That is when we speak of an unemployment rate between 1977 and 1980 we should understand that when the economy grows, when there is growth and opportunity; when the economy grows at 4 percent, then people who are graduating from high school and entering the job market or leaving college and entering the job market for any reason, can find a job. Four percent growth in the economy creates enough new jobs to maintain stable employment in our Nation.

If the economy grows at less than 4 percent, then unemployment increases. In 1977, this economy was growing at the rate of 5½ percent. That meant that it was pulling people off of the unemployment rolls and into the work place to provide jobs for the unemployed and thus respond to the human needs that the gentleman mentioned so well in his presentation.

By 1978, we did some rather drastic things. No. 1, we increased taxes on the oil companies by $55 billion. We know who paid those taxes. The fact of the matter is, taxes, for whatever motive, increased by $55 billion. Money taken out of the private sector and into Government through a series of policy and tax changes. By 1980 we had gone from 5½ percent growth in 1977 down to zero growth in 1979 to a diminishing pie of 2½ percent decline in 1980. The average family of four completed the 1970's worse off in real terms than they began; for the first time in the history of the United States of America.

That is what we are talking about here. The change in policies in 1981 that brought about 5 million new jobs since that time.

The gentleman from Illinois is exactly right mentioning the Pacific Garden Mission to which I have contributed on more than one occasion and does a marvelous work. The district that I represent in southern Ohio, the coal mining, Appalachian district of southern Ohio, is very similar to the gentleman from Illinois. The needs of those people who walk the streets of this Nation seeking warmth and trying to find a place to obtain food. Trying just merely to stay alive, that is what we are talking about.

The question is: Do we pursue the policies of the latter 1970's that brought stagnation, unemployment and growing poverty? Let us remember, Government does not produce anything, Government merely takes from people. Government cannot create wealth, it does not have the capacity to create wealth.

So, therefore, do we pursue policies that encourage growth, that encourage opportunity, that encourage jobs, or do we leave those people left out there that must walk the highways of southern Ohio and southern Illinois hoping to find a chunk of coal along the road in order to heat their homes and say that we are going to tax your fellow Americans to destroy their competitive edge internationally, to destroy their jobs to make the pie smaller in order to funnel it to you through a Government program. Or do we raise the tide that lifts all boats. Do we have growth and opportunity for all Americans? Do we allow new jobs to come to Hillsboro, Ohio, and to southern Illinois and elsewhere and have the economic reconaissance that is beginning to blossom forth right now or do we go back to the policies that we followed in the latter half of the 1970's in which by every analysis or impartial observer concludes that it was disastrous.

Mr. SIMON. If I may reclaim my time, and partially agree with the gentleman from Ohio, but also disagree.

First, I disagree with the sweeping statement that I hear made periodically that Government cannot create jobs, Government is not productive. The reality is that the three areas that this country is successful in in exports are computers, aerospace, and agriculture. In all three it has been substantial Government funding of research that has made possible the kind of productivity that we have had in this country. Government does contribute to wealth. Just as Japan's investment in education today is going to contribute to their wealth 10 years from now. And it is folly for us to be cutting back on educational investment in this country as we are.

Where I do agree with the gentleman is we want that private sector to grow. In Hillsboro, Ohio, and Hillsboro, Ill., we want to get that private sector growing, but let us not forget the people who for one reason or another do not get employed in that private sector. Let us find some constructive answers. Let us find answers that are better than handing people a welfare check. Let us find answers that our free economy can provide with Government help. Government is not an evil, Government is a tool that can be used either for good or for evil. Let us use it in a constructive way.

And that is what Humphrey-Hawkins tried to get us to do.

I yield back the balance of my time.

● Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Chairman, I rise to give my strongest support to the measure offered by my colleague.

We are in the midst of a period in our history when the President of the United States has abandoned the poor and the unemployed.

The administration looks at 7 and 8 percent unemployment rates, and says that we are at an acceptable level of recovery. The administration creates a $180 billion deficit, and claims that we are on the road to prosperity. And the administration proposes a $2 trillion defense budget, and announces that we are entering a new era of peace.

Mr. Chairman, we cannot allow ourselves or our people to be subjected to this Orwellian double-think without a strong response. And the best response I can think of is to bring the administration back to the reality of what it is doing—back to the reality of poor people without hope, homeless people without shelter, and jobless people without benefits. This, Mr. Chairman, is our duty.

My distinguished colleague has made a bold move to put us back on the right track. He has proposed that we mandate the implementation of programs which will move us toward achieving the goals of 4-percent unemployment and 3-percent inflation.

At the heart of this measure is the ability for us to choose which programs can best achieve these goals. We will have the power to choose and clearly state what our priorities are before the entire Nation. In this way, the American people will know in what direction we are heading, and will therefore be able to voice their opinions more directly on Federal policies and initiatives.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, we will create a very healthy atmosphere wherein the American people will have a much greater say in the administration's priorities and goals. And let us be very frank, this input does not exist at this time.

The President's 1985 budget fails entirely to solve the needs of those suffering under Reaganomics. He is actually proud of cutting education funds, housing programs, food assistance, and urban development grants. The blame for his unbelievable deficit is being laid at the feet of Congress and at the feet of past administrations.

I ask you, how much longer will we let him get away with this? How many more distortions of fact will he be allowed to dream up? I say that it is time for us to call a halt to Reaganomics. We cannot allow the poor and unemployed to continue bearing the burden of economic hardship and the brunt of a warped political philosophy. It is time for a new agenda and a new initiative from this Congress. For this reason, Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to support this amendment.●

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. JONES) has 79 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATTA) has 73 minutes remaining.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. JONES), the chairman of the Budget Committee.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. RATCHFORD).

Mr. RATCHFORD. Mr. Chairman, in his State of the Union address to us last January, the President proposed that we work on a $100 billion "downpayment on the deficit" to begin attacking what is undoubtedly the most important issue before Congress.

Ten weeks later, we now have the opportunity nearly to double the downpayment target we were offered. The Budget Committee has brought us a 3-year, $182 billion deficit reduction plan. This is a good downpayment, one that will reduce the heavy mortgage price we and our children will have to pay in the coming years. I believe the package before us today deserves the support of the House.

Three important themes run through the resolution brought to us by the Budget Committee under the able leadership of Chairman JIM JONES, including: Deficit reduction, adoption of a pay-as-you-go approach for new spending increases, and ordering budget priorities so Government can remain sensitive to pressing human needs.

Clearly, the huge deficits predicted under the current administration's budget request are much, much too high. These deficits threaten sustained economic growth by forcing the Federal Government to borrow more and more private capital to pay for its borrowing. With less private capital come higher interest rates, less investment by business, and a possible plunge back into recession.

If we do not act, financing the deficit will consume about three-quarters of available savings in 1987. Adoption of this package, however, will reduce the Federal Government's appetite for private capital to about one-half of available savings by 1987. So if we want sustained, private-sector economic recovery, we need to begin right now by cutting deficits and making savings available for investment rather than for debt service.

The use of a pay-as-you-go procedure in financing real increases in spending is welcome and long overdue. Pay-as-you-go has been used successfully by State and local governments for years, and it is the most responsible way I know of to insure that the Government does not spend money it does not have.

In this resolution, the $49.8 billion in revenue increases would finance the $44.8 billion proposed increase in defense and $5 billion proposed increase for disability insurance, child health, and other programs which meet the pressing needs of low-income people.

Mr. Chairman, I believe it is high time we stop feeding the deficit and adopt this coordinated approach to spending. We should not commit ourselves to new expenditures without specifying where the money will come from. This way, Congress and the American people will actually see what each new expenditure will cost.

Between fiscal years 1980 and 1984, we have financed a 90-percent increase in defense spending largely through increasing budget deficits. Yet, we have ignored the lesson of the television commercial that, given the choice of "you can pay me now or you can pay me later," it will be dangerously more expensive not to pay now.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, we can take the wise step of beginning to pay for our needs now and still be sensitive to the real problems the less fortunate face.

The resolution contains substantial reductions in spending for both entitlements and nondefense discretionary programs. The cuts proposed are sensible, and they make the burden of restraint a little easier by requiring almost everyone to carry part of it. Moreover, the resolution recognizes the real needs of the handicapped, the disabled, and college students who need loans to finance their education. Their needs will be met.

Mr. Chairman, this is a fair, responsible budget resolution. We must adopt the deficit reduction package that this resolution embodies, and we need to institute the pay-as-you-go approach now and in the future to insure spending restraint.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 12 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. DANNEMEYER).

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Chairman, under the rule that the Rules Committee has precised for our consideration of the budget alternative for this year, I am privileged to be able to offer to the House for its consideration a budget resolution designated No. 2 in order.

I have before me a list or a comparison of the five budgets that will be offered by my five colleagues on the Democratic side—JONES, ROEMER, DIXON, MCHUGH, and MACKAY. I also have a summary of the three that may be offered on the Republican side—the President's, the GOP, and the budget by the gentleman from California, eight in total.

I know we all deal in comparisons because they are important, and I think the essential difference in the budget that this Member from California will be pleased to present has certain distinctive factors about it that I would like to bring to the Members' attention.

First off, it has the lowest level of spending of any of the eight for fiscal year 1985. I will repeat that: The lowest level of spending for fiscal year 1985 of the eight.

It also is unique in that it has no tax increases of any of the eight alternative budgets for our consideration this day.

The lowest level of spending, no tax increases. Those are two distinctive characteristics which I believe sets this budget apart from all eight of them.

Well, how do we do that? The usual litany that we hear—and I heard it earlier today—is that, "Well, the White House is responsible for this deficit that we have."

Our colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER), earlier brought to the floor for our consideration some interesting data, and I want to share it with my colleagues. It goes back over a 5-year span and it analyzes the budget resolution which the House adopted and, in addition—what do you know?—the total of the appropriation bills that followed the adoption of the budget resolution that is in excess of the budget resolution.

And I want to read the totals of the excess: In 1980, after adopting a budget resolution calling for spending of $532 billion, we in this Congress adopted a total of spending which was $47 billion higher than our own budget resolution. Then in 1981, we had a budget resolution that had $613 billion in it. And what do you know, throughout the year we adopted individual appropriation bills that totaled $43 billion more than our budget resolution. And then in 1982, the budget resolution called for $695 billion, and we adopted $33 billion more when we considered the individual appropriation bills. And then in 1983, our budget resolution was $769 billion, and we adopted individual appropriation bill totals of $26 billion more. And in this current fiscal year, our budget resolution was $849 billion, and so far we have adopted spending totals of $3.5 billion in excess of that.

Over this 5-year span, these figures total $153 billion of spending beyond the budget resolutions. Presidents propose, Congress disposes. We in the Congress adopted spending levels $153 billion higher over this 5-year span than was justified by our budget resolutions for said period. The total is $174 billion higher than what the President proposed for said 5-year period.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DANNEMEYER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, we do not want to mislead people here. The $174 billion is over and above what Presidents asked to spend. We actually were $154 billion over what we said we were going to spend. So that we were not only more irresponsible than what the Presidents asked for, but when we get down to the actual amounts that we spent, we were $154 billion more than we pledged ourselves to spend and, supposedly within the process, cap overselves into spending.

What this shows is that every time we come out here with these budget waivers on the floor, that is what is happening, we are simply raising the amounts. And is it not interesting that $154 billion comes very close to what the budet deficit level is right now?

Mr. DANNEMEYER. That is the point. I thank my colleague for making that point.

Mr. BETHUNE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DANNEMEYER. I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. BETHUNE. Given that set of facts, it would seem to me that if we err here when we set a spending target, that we ought to err on the side of setting a tough, low-spending target rather than one that is more moderate or liberal, because we are going to bust it, whatever target we set. And that is the object of the first budget resolution, in the first place, is to set a target, and then try to meet it. We do not ever meet it.

So I want to compliment the gentleman for trying to force this House to set a very tough target for itself so that we will wind up with the lowest possible level of spending and still meet all of the service needs that we want.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. I thank my colleague for that contribution, and I thank my colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER), for making that correction that we in Congress exceeded our budget resolution by $154 billion, and it was $174 billion more than what the President had requested.

In consideration of the deficit, what to do about it, we could raise taxes or cut spending or a combination of both to achieve what we all want to do on both sides; namely, a reduction of the deficit. And the reason that I oppose the option of raising taxes is because we Americans are not undertaxed. We are taxing our people today at about 19 percent of GNP, which is close to a historic high. Our problem is we are spending too much. Twenty-four percent of the GNP is what we in the Congress are spending, and that 5 percent spread of GNP is the deficit.

So I am not inclined to offer to the House for its consideration the alternative of raising taxes. That is what compels me to offer the alternative of cutting spending.

And I think it is also appropriate, when we talk about where we are today, to reflect on the fact that in the last year—and it has been mentioned here today earlier on the floor—our economy has grown by some 4.7 million new jobs, lifting employment in the country from 99.2 million to 103.9 million, a 4.7-percent jump in 1 year.

During this same period, unemployment fell by 2.7 million, from 11.5 million to 8.8 million, a 23.5-percent drop.

The Congressional Budget Office has estimated the Federal Government loses about $25 billion for each 1 percent of unemployment. So putting 2.7 million Americans back to work, which represents a decline in the unemployment rate of 2.6 percent, from 10.4 percent in February 1983 to 7.8 percent in February 1984, means that a potential $68 billion is being generated to offset the fiscal years 1984 and 1985 deficits.

Indeed, February Treasury statistics indicate that for the first 5 months of fiscal year 1984 revenues are increasing 11.3 percent above last year's level, while outlays are up only 3.7 percent. If this trend holds—and we all hope that it will—the deficit for fiscal year 1984 should be closer to $160 billion instead of $189 billion estimated by the CBO.

The cumulative effects of the deficits projected for 1985 and beyond are even more profound.

I believe we need to keep our hands off both the economy and the taxpayers' wallets. The recovery of this past year is more pronounced than anticipated, but it is still relatively fragile, it is susceptible to changes in climate. And raising taxes now would risk imposing an ice age which would close more plants and force millions back into unemployment.

As to the canard that we need to impose higher taxes on the wealthy and corporations because they are not paying their fair share of existing taxes, this premise is disputed by the facts. My colleague from New York (Mr. KEMP) has prepared an analysis which reveals significant changes in tax revenue collected between 1981 and 1982.

As a percentage of total income tax paid, those earning less than $20,000 comprise 17 percent in 1981, dropping to 15 percent in 1982. Conversely, those earning $100,000 or more paid 15 percent of all taxes in 1981, climbing to 18 percent in 1982. Middle-income Americans, our colleague from Illinois (Mr. SIMON) has gone from the floor, but he will take comfort, as we all will, that middle-income Americans, those falling in the $20,000 to $100,000 range, comprised 68 percent in 1981 and 67 percent in 1982.

To look at it another way, the lowest income group, those earning less than $10,000 a year, paid 13 percent fewer taxes in 1982 than in 1981. Millionaires, on the other hand, paid a whopping 42 percent more in 1982.

The state of the economy has a more visible effect on corporate taxes. For the first 5 months of 1984 compared to the same period last year, individual income tax receipts are up 3.8 percent, from $122.9 billion to $127.6 billion. Corporation income taxes has leaped 70.9 percent from $7.9 billion to $13.5 billion.

Pretax corporate profits have climbed 36.2 percent from $167.5 billion to $228.1 billion and tax liability has jumped 58 percent from $54 billion to $85.3 billion. Corporate taxes are more volatile with respect to economic influences. Drastic fluctuation in just the past year illustrates this fact. We realize greater revenues from corporate sources if we maintain a healthy economy, and that means not aborting the recovery with tax increases.

I believe the message to us is clear: Our response should be equally clear, a booming economy will automatically reduce future budget deficits. We need to augment these reductions by preserving the recovery and freeing badly needed investment capital currently being eaten up by high interest rates, and that means reducing spending.

My budget amendment pares nearly $200 billion from deficits over the next 3 years. The largest share of this reduction comes from implementing many of the recommendations of the Grace Commission. Restructuring the Federal credit budget via the market plan, savings from interest, and various other options comprise other major savings. Only $7 billion are raised in revenue, and that from user fees recommended by the Grace Commission.

The public has become aware of the Grace Commission. They have been demanding that we cut the fat for some time now. We have been more inclined, however, to simply chew the fat. This budget amendment presents an opportunity for us to heed the desire of most Americans that we get our fiscal house in order. We should do no less than to keep faith with them and reduce spending, not reach in their pockets and deplete their wallets.

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. PANETTA).

Mr. PANETTA. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, there really is not much question that we are embarking on what I think is the most important debate that will take place in this Congress. We are facing votes that will have a critical impact upon the future course of this Nation.

We are talking about the priorities of this country for the future. To talk about those priorities clearly involves a decision on resources.

Resources relate to our decisions on national defense, they relate to our decisions on foreign policy, they relate to our decisions regarding the needs of people in this country, they relate to decisions about whether we will explore space, whether we will provide a decent education for our children, they relate to a whole series of priority areas that demand our attention.

I realize that when you reach a period of $200 billion deficits, that there is probably enough blame to go around for everybody; this is not a question of who is to blame. The question is, Do we understand the dangers that are involved in continuing to run these enormous deficits?

I think the dangers are obvious and the danger signals are out there now. Yes, we are in a recovery; yes, it is a strong recovery, without question, but the real question that concerns everybody is whether we are talking about a short-term recovery or whether in fact we have a strong, lasting recovery that will take us into the future.

The danger signals are obvious; whether it is high interest rates and the instability of interest rates, whether it is the record trade deficits that we are running, whether it is the market situation that we believe reflects concern about where deficits are, all of these factors are related to the record deficits that we are facing now and in the future.

Whatever budget resolution you consider in these next 2 days, the principal challenge is to look at that resolution and ask whether it controls deficits and controls them in in a way that is achievable, that is fair, that is effective, and that is enforceable. These should be the key elements in your decision.

There is a lot of discussion on this floor about the budget process: Does it work or does it not work? The worst thing we can do with the budget process is to enact a budget resolution that cannot be enforced by the Congress. That is the worst thing that can happen to the budget process. If you do not care about the budget process, then vote for the resolutions that promise you pie in the sky. But if you care about the budget process, then it seems to me that you have to begin to consider this question: Which of these resolutions can be enforced by the House of Representatives?

This is a difficult year because deficits are so high. I know Members are struggling for simple answers to complex problems. In this year, more than in prior years, Members are caught up in marketing labels; Members are caught up in simple approaches; Members are caught up in freezes of one kind or another.

I have heard all of the marketing labels for what you do with the budget resolution. The bottom line has to be numbers. Do you achieve the numbers? Can you enforce the numbers that you build into a resolution? I do not care what kind of a marketing concept you want to apply to a resolution. The real question is can you enforce it, whatever resolution is adopted.

We have eight resolutions before the House; four to be considered today, four tomorrow. It is difficult for Members to look at each of these resolutions and try to analyze what is happening with defense, with revenues, with domestic spending. It is difficult enough for the Budget Committee, and I can imagine how difficult it is for Members who are just beginning to look at the eight different proposals that they will face.

I ask you to approach each of these resolutions asking the following questions.

One, what is the deficit reduction contained in each resolution? What is proposed in each area for reducing the deficit over the next 3 years?

Second, all of these proposals involve a freeze of some kind. I have yet to see a pure freeze presented in any of the proposals. Frankly, there is no such thing as a pure freeze. Every freeze is modified in some way, whether it is defense, whether it is domestic spending, whether it is means-tested entitlements, whatever. There is always an exception to a pure freeze.

I think the question that has to be asked is if there is a freeze, is it fair? Is it as fair as possible considering the priorities that we care about?

Third, every resolution here involves increases in spending, let us not kid anybody. We are talking about increases in defense in many of the resolutions. The President himself, in his original budget proposal, had increases in spending of $223 billion—$180 billion for defense; $10 billion for a space station; $10 billion for military assistance; and $20 billion for other program. I mean, let us not kid anybody, all of these proposals involve some kind of increases in spending.

So, the question you have to ask is if there are increases, how are they paid for? Are they paid for with revenues, are they paid for through spending cuts, or are they paid for by borrowing?

The last question, and perhaps the most important question, is which one of these eight proposals is, in the end, enforceable, achievable? Which one, in fact, can be implemented by the Congress so that we are not simply providing a false promise to the American people, but a promise that we can stand by with votes.

It is my position, as a member of the Committee on the Budget, that the Committee on the Budget resolution provides what I think is the most balanced approach to the questions that need to be asked on each of these resolutions.

The deficit reduction contained in the Committee on the Budget proposal is $182 billion over 3 years. That is doable. I look at some of the proposals that Members are going to be considering and it is a game of "Can You Top This?" I think one goes up to $324 billion over 3 years. I am sure we could have come up with a proposal for $400 billion or $500 billion over 3 years.

That is not the question. The question is: Which one of these proposals provides a realistic deficit reduction package over the next 3 years? I think the committee's package does that by incorporating the revenue package that has been reported by the Committee on Ways and Means, by implementing some $15 billion in reductions in the domestic area, both entitlements and nondefense discretionary spending, by reducing defense by $95 billion, and by implementing the realistic proposals that have been submitted by the Grace Commission.

The second question that I think needs to be asked is: Is the freeze that is applied a fair freeze? There is a freeze in the committee proposal. It is 3.5-percent nominal growth across the board. Yes, there are exceptions, but they are realistic exceptions.

We are not going to cut social security. We have implemented a compromise package. There is no way the House or the other body are going to change social security, so it exempts social security.

Putting a limit below nominal growth in defense is not realistic, very frankly. Congress is not going to cut defense below nominal growth, so there is an exception for defense.

Third, the means-tested programs, the programs that have been impacted the most over the last 3 years and that serve the poorest of the poor, the safety-net programs, are also exempted, for legitimate reasons.

So there is a 3.5-percent freeze, but it exempts those areas that we think are not going to be realistically frozen by the Congress this year.

The next question is, If we have increases either in defense or in the domestic area, how do we pay for them?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California (Mr. PANETTA) has expired.

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 additional minutes to the gentleman from California.

Mr. PANETTA. I thank the gentleman for yielding this additional time to me.

Mr. Chairman, the increases contained in the committee proposal are to take defense up to a 3.5-percent real growth. I do not think that is out of the question. The Appropriations Committee last year adopted a spending level of approximately 3.7 percent. We did not lose any weapons systems, the defense of the country did not crumble. It was a proposal that was ultimately agreed to by the President himself.

So 3.5-percent real growth is not outlandish in terms of a level of growth in defense that makes sense.

In addition to that, we provide $5 billion to reflect increases in spending that we believe the Congress is going to approve. This Congress has already passed disability changes. That is about $1 billion. Everybody voted for the disability change, and yet the committee's resolution is one of the few that reflects the fact that we have to pay for it.

So it seems to me that if my colleagues really believe that increases ought to be either paid for or supported by reductions, then the committee's proposal, which follow this concept, should be adopted.

Last, on enforcement. I think this is the most important point that needs to be made. This is an enforceable resolution. It surely is enforceable on the revenue side, because the number we are talking about is agreed to by the Committee on Ways and Means, by the Senate Finance Committee, and by the President of the United States. We are talking about $48 or $49 billion. That is doable. It is achieveable.

Second, on defense. The defense reductions are also achievable, again because, as I pointed out, the Committee on Appropriations adopted a roughly 3.5- or 3.7-percent increase last year.

The entitlement reductions are also doable. Incidentally, we intend to raise reconciliation next week, following the adoption of the budget resolution, to insure that spending cuts accompany any tax increases that take place. That $12.3 billion in savings in the entitlement area is doable, and the committees are beginning already to take action on those various pieces.

The toughest piece is appropriations. Can we hold appropriations to the level set in the resolution we adopt? That is dependent on a majority vote in this institution. We must insure that the appropriations bills that come to the floor do not breach the spending ceiling set in the resolution.

So from an enforcement point of view, this resolution is doable. It is not just a false promise. It is something we can do. The challenge for the House and for the Congress is to control deficits, but the real challenge is to do it in a way that is realistic, that is fair, and that is enforceable.

For that reason, I urge the Members to support the resolution proposed by the Committee on the Budget.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. LOEFFLER).

Mr. LOEFFLER. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, during the course of the debate today on the budget resolution for fiscal year 1985, much has been said about the pay-as-you-go principle. I believe it is most important that this phrase, "pay as you go," not be glossed over.

The Democrats' budget, described as a pay-as-you-go plan, sounds good. It is the kind of thing we would like to see. It implies a balanced budget, but upon closer examination, in my judgment it is just a simple sham. Worse, it disguises in a new, sexy wrapping, a rationale for the same liberal objectives, tax more and more to pay for more and more Federal spending.

That is right. Good old tax and spend, but with a new twist. So, as we pursue consideration of the budget resolution for fiscal year 1985, let us have it perfectly understood that the cute little twist this year is pay as you go.

As I mentioned, the pay-as-you-go concept would imply a balanced budget on an annual basis. However, the Democratic pay-as-you-go budget ignores that fact, the House Committee on the Budget is proposing a budget deficit of $175 billion in fiscal year 1985 alone. In my judgment in the face of this kind of deficit, it is absolutely absurd to talk of pay as you go, especially the kind of selective pay-a-little-as-you-go, or pay-along-the-way approach that they have taken.

The Democratic pay-as-you-go plan is just another name, in my judgment, for tax as you go merrily down the garden path to economic chaos. It ignores or attempts to obscure the fundamental issue facing us in Congress, and that is the appropriate size of the Federal sector.

Pay as you go is a neat shell game devised to distract attention from the fact that the Government sector is growing ever larger year by year. This is in fundamental opposition to the basic philosophy of the new era in American political history known as the "New Beginning," which was initiated in a bipartisan manner during 1981.

Since 1981 the thrust has been to return Government to a smaller, more appropriate role in the lives of citizens, including the reduction in the tax burden on individuals and businesses—a tax burden which played a major role in the economic stagnation which prevailed during the late seventies.

Pay-as-you-go, then, is a dangerous principle as it has been interpreted and applied by the majority. It implies that you can simply tax and tax to support ever higher levels of Government spending, and that there is nothing inherently wrong with the Government absorbing an increasing share of the Nation's gross national product, our Nation's wealth, as long as the Government taxes productive citizens and businesses in order to pay for it.

As we continue this budget debate for fiscal year 1985, if we are going to face the political realities this year and recognize that we are not going to solve the deficit problem in its entirety but that we can make an honest effort toward a deficit downpayment and return next year to address the problem again, let us get on with it. But let us not play with the economic future of the Nation by voting for the liberals' concept of pay-as-you-go. It is a diversion from the main event, and it makes a mockery of responsible fiscal policymaking.

Realistically, the pay-as-you-go concept is better described as "pay along the way," at best. What is wrong with including in the concept "reduce along the way," as well?

Again I think it is most important for the Members of this body to recognize that the fine sounding theme of pay-as-you-go cannot be glossed over and accepted without critical examination. The budget resolution before us, described as a pay-as-you-go budget resolution, has a deficit of $175 billion projected for fiscal year 1985, and there are deficits thereafter, as well.

Mr. Chairman, in my judgment the budget resolution that will be offered later during debate by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATTA) is the best approach that will maintain the momentum that was begun in 1981 and 1982, as we reduced the rate of growth in Federal spending, as we relieved some of the confiscatory tax policies of the past that threatened the viability of the private sector and as we provided a responsible increase in defense spending necessary to overcome the inadequacies and neglect of the seventies.

This year we will not solve our deficit problems. No one will argue with that. But this year is important as we progress in our efforts to reach that ultimate balanced budget, because we must maintain the direction and the approach of policies that were begun in 1981, to provide for a strong, economically healthy Nation.

Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to give very close scrutiny and ultimate support to the alternative that will be later offered by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATTA). Again we should remember this: Do not gloss over pay-as-you-go. Do not buy a concept that is not real.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. JONES).

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to a very distinguished member of the Budget Committee, the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. HEFNER).

Mr. HEFNER. Mr. Chairman, we are faced at best with trying to make a downpayment, as requested by the President of the United States, on the deficits that we are having throughout the foreseeable future, and there is none of these budgets that really I am all that happy about. I do not think there is any Member of this House that wants to vote for a deficit of $160 billion, $170 billion, or $190 billion.

My good friend, the gentleman from Texas, has raised the question about, pay-as-you-go. We are not talking about pay-as-you-go in the true sense, but what we are talking about is to pay the moneys that we raise in taxes, and we are not going to spend in excess of what we raise in taxes for new programs.

There is not a budget that is going to be considered on this House floor today or tomorrow that does not carry with it some kind of tax package, and there is not a budget that is going to be offered on this House floor today or tomorrow that does not have some assumptions that are going to be proved to be wrong or that does not have some savings that are projected that are going to be proven to be wrong, even some of the savings projected in the Grace report are not achievable.

Mr. HEFNER. Certainly I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Chairman, maybe the gentleman has misspoken, but it is fair to say that the budget alternative which this gentleman from California will offer has no tax increases in it, and it also has the lowest projected deficit. We get there by cutting spending, not by raising taxes.

Mr. HEFNER. Mr. Chairman, I misspoke myself, as the President has said on occasion. I admit my error. But the other budgets offered will carry tax packages. Mr. DANNEMEYER's is the only budget that does not carry some kind of a tax package with it.

We can talk about this and we can use rhetoric, and in a campaign year we can talk about all the cutting of spending and what we want to do and where our priorities are, but when we come down to the bottom line, there "ain't" no way we are going to get to reducing this deficit unless we address the spending and the taxes and make some cuts in defense and hold the line on other programs.

We have got a $925 billion projected deficit, we have in excess of $108 billion of interest that is not negotiable, and then we have the defense portion that is close to $300 billion. That leaves us about $500 billion to try to get a substantial cut in.

Mr. Chairman, I want to cut spending as much as anybody and have voted to do so, but on some of the discretionary programs that everybody likes to talk about cutting, when it comes to a vote on the House floor on both sides of the aisle, Members are not going to vote to cut some of these discretionary programs. And then we talk about the means tested programs. These programs, the means tested programs, get the most criticism. They are for the poorest of the poor. I make no apology for voting for these programs. I make no apology for trying to keep these programs at their current levels, at least, and many of these programs have in effect had severe cuts in the past few years.

So I think, when we talk about this in our deliberations, it does not serve us well with the American public to call different budgets a sham and refer to them as different sorts of things, because we are all here to get to a down payment on these deficits, and nobody is going to take any joy from the final product, whatever it is, in voting for a deficit of in excess of $150 billion.

So I think that we need to keep in mind, when we are considering these budgets, what is going to be doable and not gloss them over and use a smokescreen on things that are not doable. We must try to come up with an agreement that we can take to the other body and work out in conference a budget that is fair and will move us in the right direction. That will send a signal to the markets and to the American people that we are at least making a downpayment.

It is not a pay-as-you-go. We are not making a downpayment on the overall, but at least we are making a downpayment on the deficit, and that is what the President requested. He requested that we make a downpayment on the deficit. That was the understanding from the very start.

Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to look at all these budgets when they come up and to give them very close scrutiny. And I believe that the most honest budget is the Budget Committee budget.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL).

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, when Congress considers a budget for the coming fiscal year, it should do so seriously. The budget should establish priorities, which should be followed as closely as possible. Spending for favorite programs inevitably causes budget ceilings to be breached. Some, like me, feel that this is an unacceptable practice, and that the budget should provide ceilings which should not be broken except under extraordinary circumstances.

Mr first priority in judging the alternative budgets this year is how effective they would be in reducing the deficit. My intention is to support an enforceable budget that results in the greatest possible deficit reduction.

Under the rule, we will consider eight amendments in order. The first is the President's February budget as reestimated by the Congressional Budget Office. That budget was the necessary first step. It made deficit reductions below the current policy baseline, but did not go far enough. It also contained, in my judgment, too much defense spending.

Congress, meanwhile, has upped the ante on deficit reductions. This is a welcome development. The President's March 50–50–50 deficit reduction plan, developed in response to Congress willingness to consider deficit reductions, should be taken seriously. Those who wish to support the President's budget, or any budget which can be passed an enforced, should look to the Latta amendment.

The second amendment to be considered is Mr. DANNEMEYER's, which contains many of the recommendations of the Grace Commission. This amendment is a serious deficit reduction proposal with strong and noble motivation, but in my judgment it does not present a serious or effective budget. Last year's House budget called for tax increases that would not be adopted, and so reported an impossibly low deficit. The Dannemeyer amendment includes savings which I, and perhaps others, would support. However, they will almost certainly not be adopted by the House. It would be dishonest to claim these uncertain savings in the budget.

Moreover, I have some reservations about some specific portions of the amendment. As an example, the 5 percent penalty assessment on unfunded PBGC pension liabilities would save very little, but would have grave effects. Existing penalties have chased many out of pension programs. An additional penalty would be very unwise.

The Roemer amendment starts with the basis of the House Budget Committee budget, but goes in the wrong direction. The amendment would increase defense growth from 3.5 percent after inflation to 5 percent after inflation. That increase in defense spending is matched almost exactly by subtracting 2 percent from the indexing limit on Federal income taxation. That is a poor trade-off, in my judgment. It is just a higher tax version of the committee's pay-as-you-go principle which I consider unwise. It simply taxes people more to provide what the authors believe is necessary national security.

I am attracted by the savings in nondefense discretionary spending in the Roemer amendment, but I am concerned about the COLA—2 percent for entitlements, which would include social security like each of the proposals, it is a mixed bag. Its great advantage is that it delivers the highest deficit reduction figure of all plans except the Dannemeyer plan.

The Dixon amendment, like the Dannemeyer amendment, is not a frivolous effort, but it is not a realistic or enforceable budget. Negative defense growth and huge tax increases are not going to be implemented, nor should they.

The McHugh amendment also starts at the levels recommended in the committee bill, but it too strays. Further decreases in defense and increased revenues will probably have to be a part of deficit reductions, either this year or next. I cannot support either measure, though, if there are no greater savings made in domestic spending than are made in the committee bill, which is mirrored in the McHugh amendment.

The MacKay amendment is somewhat attractive to me, since I offered a version of it during the House Budget Committee markup. I would prefer the committee bill without the pay-as-you-go spending provisions. I will not support the MacKay amendment or the committee bill, however, as neither makes any savings in domestic programs. The committee bill without pay-as-you-go was rigged to begin with so that increased domestic spending could be facilitated, unattached to tax increases. The tax increase was attached to only $2.45 billion in domestic spending, but $44.8 billion in defense. A better alternative is to make more domestic savings in addition to the defense savings and tax increases.

After the Latta amendment, the last alternative is the committee bill. I voted against it in committee, and I shall vote against it again. Real deficit reduction comes only with shared, across-the-board sacrifice. However, this bill does not call for any substantial savings in domestic spending, even though Members piously intone deficit reduction should be our first priority this year. This budget is not a real deficit downpayment. It should be rejected.

Mr. Chairman, I shall support the Latta amendment, which is an improved version of the President's March deficit reduction budget. This budget offers the best alternative for those Members who wish to support the President's initiatives on deficit reduction.

I am not, however, completely satisfied with the Latta amendment. If there were a better alternative I would support it. There is none.

My principle objection to the Latta amendment is the 7-percent real increase in defense spending. My judgment is that defense will have to accept greater savings if we are to have real deficit reductions. I feel that 3.5 percent real increase recommended by the committee is enough and that such an increase is all this Congress will ultimately appropriate.

I support the Latta amendment, however, because of its principle of shared burden in deficit reductions. Of $181.4 billion in noninterest savings deficit reductions, $53.6 billion, or 30 percent, comes from increased taxes and user fees; $40.2 billion, or 22 percent, comes from defense savings. $77.6 billion, or 43 percent, comes from domestic savings. We do more in savings, and should, but the comparative figures for the committee budget are $48.4 billion, or 30.2 percent, from taxes; $95.7 billion, or 60 percent, from defense; and $14.1 billion, or 9 percent, from domestic savings.

Moreover, my judgment is that the Latta budget offers even greater opportunities for deficit reductions. I believe that revenues will increase slightly more than the Latta budget calls for. I also believe that defense will not increase as rapidly as the Latta budget indicates. I am sure, however, that if we adopt the committee budget we will see no greater savings in domestic spending than is required in the bill. It is likely we will see more.

Mr. Chairman, these deficit reductions can only be the beginning. We have been successful in moving away from inevitable $200 billion deficits. This year's efforts have been important.

However, savings in all Federal programs must be part of any deficit reduction package. No program can be sacred as long as deficits remain. We must address all aspects of the problem, not one at a time. Shared, across-the-board sacrifice will be necessary. We should act quickly and responsibly

As a first step, I urge a yes vote on the Latta amendment, and a no vote on other amendments.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Before I yield to the next speaker, I do want to tell my good friend, the gentleman from Minnesota, who is a valued member of the Budget Committee, that I think the Budget Act has, indeed, reduced the deficits.

As a matter of fact, John Rhodes, the former distinguished minority leader of the House of Representatives, has said that the deficits would probably be $400 billion higher had it not been for the disciplines, imperfect as they are, of the Budget Act since 1976.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 8 minutes to another distinguished member of the Budget Committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. DONNELLY).

Mr. DONNELLY. I thank the chairman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, to be very frank, when this year began I was very skeptical, as a member of the Budget Committee, that this institution would be willing and able to achieve any sort of deficit reduction due to the political and economic circumstances that we faced as Congress convened. We had $200 deficits annualized out as far as you could see, probably a very heated and bitter Presidential election on the horizon, congressional elections that are now taking place in primaries and will be taking place in November, a very serious clash of economic and monetary policy differences between the parties and, in fact, between individuals on both sides of the aisle.

I think this institution and the Budget Committee as a whole deserve a great deal of credit for focusing the attention of the membership on the critical problem that this Nation and the economic recovery in this Nation faces because of these enormous deficits that have been accruing over the last few years and will continue to accrue unless we have the political courage to do something about it.

So step one is that we are moving in the right direction. The debate today is what it ought to be about, and that is what are the priorities that we ought to take as an institution, those priorities whether they be in defense, those priorities whether they be on the domestic side or on monetary or tax policy.

As I look over the eight substitutes that this body will be debating over the course of the next 24 hours, there are many pieces in each one of the recommendations that are attractive to me. The Congressional Black Caucus budget has deficit reductions of $434 billion over 3 years. I do not think there would be any Member of this institution that would not like to achieve those savings if in fact it was possible.

It seems to me, and this is my sixth year in this institution, it just seems to me that some of the recommendations in defense and domestic and revenues in that case will not really be acceptable to the body politic.

My good friend from California (Mr. DANNEMEYER) has a very good budget deficit reduction of $206 billion, according to the figures I have in front of me. That is a reduction that would have an impact on the economy. But I am not sure, again, that the gentleman's defense numbers nor his domestic spending cuts in particular will be acceptable to the body politic.

What I am suggesting is that of all of the eight recommendations I think the most reasonable and rational and probably the most enforceable document is the document that has come forward from our committee. It was not an easy process. There were many heated debates over what policies we ought to adopt, what sort of approach we ought to take for deficit reduction.

But there was a sincere agreement I think on both sides of the aisle that this Congress had to move toward deficit reduction. I would suggest that the document from the Budget Committee achieves that.

We achieved $182 billion of deficit reduction over the course of the next 3 years. We allow defense a 3.5-percent real growth. That is a little bit higher that I would like to see, but it is acceptable to many Members on our side of the aisle and I would hope many Members on that side of the aisle.

Social security is held harmless. I think we all have to be honest with ourselves and admit that any cuts in social security will not pass the Congress. If somebody would disagree with that I would be willing to stand here and listen to them.

We hold harmless needs tested entitlements. It is a fact that over the course of the last 3 years needs tested entitlements in comparison to all other entitlements have received an inordinate amount of cuts.

I argued very vociferously that these needs tested entitlements, those programs to protect the poorest people in our society, those programs which in my opinion, again, have received an inordinate amount of cuts should be held harmless in the next fiscal year.

We dealt with the whole entitlement area by offering a modest potpouri of cuts, about $12 billion. I chair a task force on the whole question of entitlements, which many of my friends on the other side of the aisle have attended hearings we have held. We have a problem in the entitlement area. We have a serious problem in the entitlement area, and let me suggest it will take an enormous bipartisan effort in this institution, both here in the House and in the other body, to deal with this increased and rapidly increasing rate of growth in the entitlement area.

But our budget makes a stab at it. We try to reduce in a reasonable way some of the growth in the entitlement spending by $12 billion.

We allowed domestic discretionary spending to rise 3.5 percent, nominal growth for domestic discretionary.

Needs tested discretionary was allowed to grow at 3.5 percent real.

I think that addresses a real problem we have in this country with poverty.

We also incorporate for the first time the pay-as-you-go. We are asking a legitimate, realistic figure in revenues. The figures we are asking are the figures of a bill that has already been reported from the Ways and Means Committee. In fact, it is sitting right now at the Speaker's table waiting for action by this institution. Those figures almost dollar for dollar in that revenue bill will pay for the increases our committee is recommending for defense.

I think that the House committee document is reasonable, it is rational, and a realistic approach.

Last, let me just say I think as an institution we have two overriding responsibilities during the course of the next 24 hours. One of those is that we have to pass a document. We have to show the American people that we as an institution can lead. We have to show the business community and international community that we are willing to make an effort to deal with this awful deficit problem that we face as a people.

Finally, we have to pass a document that we can implement. Many times, in many of these recommendations, if there were a wish list that we could put together to deal with the deficit problem, to deal with the realistic problems of poverty and the inability of people in this society to have economic upward mobility, I wish we could bring that document on the floor to pass. But, realistically, if we do not pass a document within the next 24 hours, if we do not pass a document which we can implement over the course of the reconciliation process, I think we do a great disservice to the economic growth that is taking place in this Nation and I think that we do a great disservice to the poorest and the most defenseless people in our society.

The American people expect a lot from us during the course of these next 24 hours and I would hope that we could keep the political rhetoric from my friends on both sides to a nominal amount, just like some of the nominal figures in our budget, and pass a budget, sent it to the other body.

The House Budget Committee's document is a good document to go to conference with and I would hope that it would be adopted.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONNELLY. I will be happy to yield.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. You alluded to the Black Caucus, Dixon substitute earlier in your remarks, and I just want to point out to the gentleman that it contains by way of a deficit reduction of some $400 billion over 3 years a tax increase in 1985 of $50 billion. Was the gentleman aware of that?

Mr. DONNELLY. The gentleman is very much aware of that.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Do you think it is likely that a tax increase of that magnitude could be passed?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. DONNELLY) has expired.

Mr. DONNELLY. I would be happy to answer the question if I can get 10 seconds.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. DONNELLY. I thank my friend for yielding.

I would suspect, and certainly have no crystal ball in front of me, but I would suspect that as much as I admire the deficit reduction in the Dixon package I would suspect that probably has about as much chance of passing as the gentleman from California's budget has of passing.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. I will have to put the gentleman down on the fence, and I appreciate the time he yielded to me.

Mr. DONNELLY. I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman from Ohio very much for yielding the time.

Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to be serious about what it is that is going on here. The record of this Congress in living up to its budget recommendations is at best abominable.

This exercise, if put in the perspective of the past performance, is a farce. It is a way of suggesting that we are doing something about the Nation's budgetary mess when in fact we intend to do no such thing.

These budgets are mockeries and they are mockeries that we ask everyone else to take seriously while we ourselves treat them with contempt and disdain when we actually go to the spending and taxing in the real world. I think all we have to do is look over the last 5 years and figure out that in the last 5 years we have been over a quarter of a trillion dollars wrong. If you add up all of the additional spending that we went over the budget, all of the additional taxes that we did not pass, that we said we were going to pass in the budget, the bottom line is that we have been wrong by $279.3 billion.

That is not a very good record. As a matter of fact, that shows you where the deficits come from in this country.

We have gone through a budgetary process which then has produced nothing. If you go back to 1980, and you take a look at our first budget resolution in 1980, we said we were going to have outlays of $532 billion. We actually had outlays of $579 billion; we were off by $48 billion.

If you take a look at how much we said we were going to raise in revenues, well, we did better in 1980 than we said we were going to. So the total deficit, we were off by about $30 billion when all was said and done.

Then you come to 1981, that was a glorious year for budgeting. That is the year when the majority leader came to the floor and gave us his famous balanced budget out here on the floor that said we were going to have outlays of $613 billion and that we were going to have revenues of $613 billion, and we were going to have a balanced budget and we were going to take that balanced budget to the country and I remember the majority side talking about the fact that they were going to be able to talk about a balanced budget out in the country.

The only problem is that we were $58 billion wrong and we ended up with $58 billion in deficit that we did not calculate into the budget.

In 1982 we said in our first budget resolution we were going to spend $695 billion and we ended up spending $728 billion. We were $33 billion wrong.

In 1983, we were $26 billion wrong in 1983, and in 1984, the spending side, so far we are $3.5 billion wrong but yet we have most of the year to go.

Let us remember that in the appropriation bills we have already had out on the floor we know that supplementals have to come in a number of those, because we have only funded certain programs for part of the year.

For instance, food stamps; we have a neat gimmick around here to stay within the budget; we bring out the food stamp program and only fund it for 10 or 11 months and we have to come back in the summer and fund it for the rest of the program.

So that $3.5 billion is where we are now. We have got to add to that yet.

So what we have done is we have spent $153.9 billion more, $154 billion more than we said we were going to over a period of 5 years. We have missed on revenues by $125.4 billion for a $279 billion mistake.

Now what we are doing out here today is probably compounding that mistake. And yet we are asking the American people to take this process seriously. No wonder they do not take it seriously; no wonder the financial markets do not take it seriously. They know doggone well when it comes to taxing and spending, we are not going to live up to these things anyhow.

Why don't we live up to it? Because we are perfectly willing to set the Budget Act aside whenever it becomes necessary to do so and we do so on bill after bill; bringing an authorization bill out here that is over the budget, "That is OK, we will just get a budget waiver on it and pass that in the rule." Bring an appropriation out here that is over budget, "That is all right, we will just get a rule and waive the budget."

Time after time we waive the budget on all of these major spending bills; either authorization or appropriation. And do we ever raise very much of an objection to the fact that we are waiving the budget? No, not really.

Sometimes some of us vote against such rules because they have budget waivers in them, but the fact is the vast majority of those rules pass here overwhelmingly. And the majority side which tells us that we are supposed to pass I think the quote was, "enforceable budgets," are the people who do not vote to enforce.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. MCHUGH).

Mr. MCHUGH Mr. Chairman, I would like to begin by commending the members of the Budget Committee and in particular the committee chairman, the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. JONES) for the hard work that they have done and for bringing to the House a resolution which is an improvement over both the President's original budget proposal and his most recent one.

The budget deficits over 3 years would be reduced by the committee proposal by a total of $182 billion, which is more than $30 billion beyond what the President's most recent proposal would do. I think that is important and a significant improvement.

However, I do think we must do better, given the threat which these budget deficits pose to our economic health. For that reason, Mr. Chairman, tomorrow I will be offering a budget proposal on my own behalf and on behalf of the Executive Committee of the Democratic Study Group.

Our proposal is based on the premise that we must reduce deficits over the next 3 years by a larger amount than either the President's or the Budget Committee's proposal would do. More specifically, the substitute which I will be offering would reduce deficits by a total of $262 billion over 3 years.

We think we will be able to do that, under our substitute resolution, in a reasonable, moderate and fair way. More particularly, our substitute would do the following: With regard to domestic spending, we incorporate precisely the numbers included in the Budget Committee proposal. Those numbers, as you know, provide that in the aggregate domestic spending programs will get an inflation adjustment less $16.8 billion over the next 3 fiscal years.

In other words, domestic spending in the aggregate will increase by an amount less than inflation. We think that this is a restrained approach. We all have favorite programs in the domestic spending field, but if we are really serious about reducing deficits we have to be restrained with respect to those programs.

In terms of defense expenditures, we are proposing in our substitute to hold defense expenditures to an inflation adjustment only over the next 3 years. We also believe that this is a moderate, responsible approach.

In the last 3 years military expenditures have increased significantly. For example, in fiscal year 1980 budget authority for the military was $146 billion; in this fiscal year of 1984, budget authority is $269 billion, an increase of $123 billion. That is a very significant increase, and in my judgment the additional funds have not been absorbed by the Pentagon in an efficient manner.

If we are truly serious about the deficits being a threat to our economic health and our national security, we must exercise some restraint in defense as well as nondefense expenditures, and our substitute budget resolution does that.

Finally, with respect to revenues, our substitute proposes to raise a total of $76 billion in revenue over the next 3 fiscal years. We assume for that purpose adoption of the Ways and Means Committee bill, which if enacted would raise about $47 billion, and adoption of an additional $29 billion.

In adopting this substitute resolution we would not, of course, be adopting any particular revenue measure but rather a revenue target. However, we think we can secure that $29 billion in additional revenue by adopting some of the tax reform proposals previously suggested by Mr. PEASE, Mr. GEPHARDT, Mr. MOODY, and myself.

I want to stress, however, that adopting this substitute would in no way bind the House to our particular preferences in revenue measures. This is a matter which would be decided at a later date when the Congress considers tax legislation.

I realize that some will suggest that an additional $29 billion in revenue over 3 years is too much to expect. In this connection I think it is important to remember that as a result of the tax legislation enacted since President Reagan took office, the U.S. Treasury will lose approximately $490 billion in revenue over the next 3 fiscal years. That is revenue that we would have collected if we had not passed the Reagan tax legislation.

What we are suggesting in our resolution is that we recapture only $76 billion of that lost revenue over the next 3 years.

I believe that this is a modest proposal, if we are serious about reducing deficits in a meaningful way. It is in that context that I hope the Members will consider our substitute resolution favorably when we present it tomorrow.

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Chairman, I strongly oppose this budget resolution. It is not at all the spending freeze it is advertised to be, but is simply a blueprint for higher domestic spending and higher taxes at the expense of a strong national defense.

Our Nation is experiencing one of the most vigorous economic recoveries in its history. Inflation is under control at 4.6 percent, unemployment has fallen to 7.8 percent, housing starts are up more than 28 percent from February 1983 levels, and the prime rate—while still too high—is at 11.5 percent, far less than the 21-percent rate under President Carter.

The greatest impediment to sustained, strong economic recovery is now the Federal budget deficit. This resolution does nothing to curb that deficit and move toward a balanced budget.

The resolution exempts most expensive entitlement programs—which have grown from about 5.5 percent of GNP in 1965 to almost 11.2 percent this year—from the committee's proposed limit of 3.5 percent spending growth per year. It proposes reductions of only $10.2 billion from 3-year non-interest-entitlement spending of $1.4 trillion, or about 0.7 percent of the total non-interest-entitlement budget.

Rather than focusing on the rapid growth of entitlements, this resolution would slash more than $140 billion from the President's 3-year request for national defense, providing a zero percent—zero percent—real spending increase, despite the fact that there is a greater threat to our Nation's security from our enemies abroad.

The committee proposes a modest defense increase of $44.8 billion over 3 years if its so-called pay-as-you-go amendment is adopted. The defense program thus accounts for 90 percent of the spending tied to tax increases under this resolution.

The prime responsibility of our Federal Government is to provide for the national defense and to protect the rights and liberties of our people. Our Nation's defense should therefore not be held hostage to ill-advised and excessive tax increases.

Furthermore, the tax increases called for under this resolution would not be applied to deficit reduction, but would simply be used to finance higher spending.

The President's private sector survey on cost control—the so-called Grace Commission—has made 2,478 recommendations for eliminating or streamlining Government activities without curtailing essential Government services. If fully implemented, the Grace recommendations would save the taxpayers $424 billion over 3 years.

I urge my colleagues to reject the blatantly partisan budget document before us today. Alternatives—like the Grace recommendations—are available which will truly reduce the deficit and make progress toward a balanced budget.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. WOLPE), a member of the committee.

Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Chairman, there are some very important differences in the alternative budget resolutions that are before the House. But as I review the various proposals, I have been equally struck and frankly encouraged by some of the similarities between the various proposals that we are now considering.

All proposals before us recommend lower deficits than those the White House originally indicated that it was prepared to accept. All project lower rates of growth in the defense budget than the administration had requested in their original budget submission. All project some increase in revenues. The consensus reflected among these very disparate resolutions is important, because I think it signals the strongest possible rejection by both sides of the aisle of the administration's claims that the Federal deficits we are experiencing are not really so threatening to our recovery, that we are going to grow our way out of the deficits, and that we simply cannot touch the President's defense request.

I sincerely hope that the President gets the message that is being delivered on a bipartisan basis by this Congress, because the fact of the matter is that the massive deficits that we are anticipating represent an economic time bomb for this country. Yes; recovery is in progress, but that recovery will be very short lived unless we address the growing structural deficit that is the direct consequence of the taxation and spending decisions that have been made over the past 3 years.

Unless we change those policies, the Federal deficit will be claiming 70 percent or more of the net savings of this country, crowding out the credit markets, denying the affordable credit that is needed for the private sector to make productive investments in new job-creating activities.

In addition, these huge Federal deficits are also causing a sharp escalation in our Nation's trade deficit. The following quotation from the 1984 Economic Report of the President emphasizes the severity of this problem:

> The 1983 deficit in merchandise trade was about $65 billion, approaching twice the previous record, which was set in 1982. A (trade) deficit in the neighborhood of $110 billion is forecast for 1984, three times the 1982 level. The deficits signify loss of income and employment in those U.S. industries that depend on exports or compete with imports.

More recent projections put the expected 1984 trade deficit at $130 billion.

Every billion dollars that we are losing in terms of our trade position in the world represents a loss of 25,000 American jobs.

Clifton C. Garvin, chairman of the Exxon Corp. and chairman of the Business Council has observed that "The trade deficit is probably costing between 1½ and 2 million jobs, and there is absolutely no turn-up at all." He also stated that trade deficits are "straining, stretching, and distorting the economy."

And let there be no mistake about it, these soaring Federal deficits are directly contributing to these soaring trade deficits because it is those Federal deficits that are keeping pressure on interest rates, that are attracting foreign capital to this country and increasing the value of the dollar as compared to other currencies. It is as if we were imposing a 25-percent tax on all of our exports, or subsidizing all imports by that same amount. This situation represents an economic catastrophe for this country, particularly for States like my State of Michigan, which are so dependent upon both foreign trade and interest-sensitive industries.

We must understand that we are not going to grow our way out of these deficits. The Congressional Budget Office recently made that very, very clear when they reported to the Budget Committee that by the year 1989, under current policies, we will be facing a Federal deficit in excess of $320 billion and that 90 percent of that deficit in the year 1989 will be structural. Even with recovery, even moving toward a full employment economy, our structural deficits would be growing larger and larger.

And, finally, if we are serious about deficit reductions we are going to have to start applying the same kind of standard to the Pentagon as we do the rest of the Federal budget. While it is acknowledged that we will not solve all of our domestic problems by throwing Federal money at them, it must also be understood that we do not enhance our national security by giving a blank check to the Pentagon.

Mr. Reagan this year has requested a 13-percent real growth increase in his original defense budget. He was asking that we spend more just for the increase in the defense budget than we spend in an entire year on the combined total budgets of the Department of Housing and Urban Development, the Department of State, the Department of Justice, the Department of the Interior, and the Office of Education. The harsh reality is that defense increases of this magnitiude are simply incompatible with efforts to get Federal deficits under control and to more fairly spread the burdens and the sacrities required in this period of budgetary crisis.

It is my hope that the outcome of this budget debate will be a new national consensus, both on the critical necessity of substantial deficit reduction and on the need for a reordering of our national budget priorities.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5½ minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. DAUB).

Mr. DAUB. Mr. Chairman, as the House of Representatives begins the process of setting forth its budget priorities for the coming fiscal year, we are confronted with the fact that the prime rate may be raised again soon.

Yesterday, a gentleman from the other body from Kansas made a remark and I quote:

> This is the time of year when budget plans bloom like cherry blossoms, and they last just about as long.

The bottom line, Mr. Chairman, is that the nature of our economic situation demands that the Congress act and apparently the Congress will choose not to.

Let me explain. Earlier this year I had spoken of opportunity. While the recovery sped along, we should have been searching for ways to prolong it. We should have been using the increasing prosperity as an opportunity to bring about the spending reforms that we knew we would be necessary in order to insure that the economic recovery would continue. Instead, this body chose to do nothing except to continue blithely along its way as the inevitable collision between the demands of Government borrowing and that of an expanding private sector approached.

Now we today face the fact that tomorrow may bring with it the kind of inflation and interest rates that will wreck havoc upon our people. Instead of recognizing the cause and our responsibility, we choose instead to opt for higher taxes and marginal if not insignificant reductions in spending. Better instead to insure the continued growth of programs that benefit the Members of Congress and their popularity than to insure the continued growth of an economy that provides the jobs and the security of Americans generally. Some Members of this body for whom politics is all important have made the claim that the deficit that threatens this country is the responsibility of the man in the White House. When they are not making that claim, they are accusing him and his party of plotting in secret to reduce the deficit after the election.

Now you cannot have it both ways. The fact is that this Congress has stood between the desires of our President to bring this deficit under control and the potentially ruinous deficits that face us almost literally tomorrow. When they are not adding billions to the budget deficit, they are claiming that he intends to attack the poor and the elderly with unfair cuts in benefits. In a sense, they wait in ambush to attack any proposal for fiscal sanity with an arsenal of lies and distortions and fear that is calculated to frustrate any attempt, no matter how reasonable or how necessary. Whatever sacrifice they seek to prevent by these methods, they realize, too, that a thousand fold occurs by making certain that the continued growth in our economy is going to be halted and, with it, hundreds of thousands of new jobs that are now being created monthly.

Just remind yourselves, if you will, about the unemployment growth from 6 to 8 million, a 33-percent increase, from 1977 to 1981. Take a look at today's gross national product figures, look at the rate of interest, the cost of money, look at the rate of inflation, the way we measure rising prices, take a look at homes, cars, look at all of the indicators that you want, overtime, expansion, plant utilization. Now, would it not be an interesting fairy tale if oil prices continue to drop, keeping American inflation rates low, if indeed the Straits of Hormuz do not close in a war that might erupt there, would it not be part of that fairy tale to note that banks are more liquid today than they ever have been before? Would it not be part of a fairy tale if we would shut this place down, go home and do nothing, and see an economic activity propel our deficits only to a level of about $130 billion or $140 billion rather than the way it is going to be if we raise taxes in the name of lowering some farmer or some small business person's interest rates?

I submit to my colleagues that the marketplace has already discounted the impact of anything we are about to do, whichever plan it is that we adopt, that the marketplace has discounted the impact of that in terms of a positive effect on the deficit, and we indeed will be right back in the soup we have been in, worrying about how to raise somebody's taxes to lower the deficit, to narrow the deficit or to lower interest rate.

So as we consider these various instruments of policy that will be brought forward for our consideration, I for one Member, will cast my lot with those who promise the American people the least—the least—in blandishments from their Government and the most—the most—in sincerity, for prosperity and for reality for our future as a country.

What I sincerely regret is that we do not have a budget here today that would insure a prosperous tomorrow beyond election day in November 1984, a budget that would say this is what we can afford and no more, a budget that would treat the American people as thinking adults and not pawns in a game of White House politics.

Mr. LOWRY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAUB. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. LOWRY of Washington. I just wanted to ask the gentleman—I think he made a fine statement, we should have been acting a lot more than we are acting—the rule allows presenting the President's budget, and perhaps the gentleman would like to go ahead and present the President's budget, which is only an $86 billion deficit reduction over 3 years.

Mr. DAUB. Reclaiming my time, the only problem I have with the gentleman's suggestion is that his own Rules Committee, which he controls, has allowed that privilege, I guess, only to the budget chairman or to Mr. WIRTH.

Mr. LOWRY of Washington. No.

Mr. DAUB. I understand that is not possible.

Mr. LOWRY of Washington. Any member of the minority, including the gentleman, may——

Mr. DAUB. I will take the gentleman's suggestion—I listened to his contribution to the RECORD.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. LUNDINE).

Mr. LUNDINE. Mr. Chairman, the issue before us today is one of the most critical facing our country. According to the Congressional Budget Office, under the budget which has been proposed by the Reagan administration, our deficits will increase from $190 billion this fiscal year to $270 billion by 1987 and over $300 billion by 1989. The budget deficit will rise from 5.3 percent of GNP in fiscal year 1984 to 6.1 percent in 1989. Our national debt will reach $3 trillion by the end of this decade. The cost of servicing this debt alone will shortly exceed two-thirds of discretionary nondefense spending, and about 4 percent of GNP.

There is one particular aspect of this budget outlook which merits our attention during this debate and in the future. It is the so-called structural deficit. As usual, a large share of the current deficit is the result of the economic recessions we have experienced since 1980 and some of it will disappear if the current recovery is sustained over a long enough period of time. For the first time, however, we are seeing a growing portion of the Federal deficit which will not disappear as recovery proceeds. The Congressional Budget Office estimates that this structural deficit could reach as high as 4 percent of GNP by the end of this decade.

This growing structural deficit reflects the fact that there is a serious imbalance between Federal spending and taxing. The combination of the gigantic increases in defense spending coming from the Reagan administration and the implementation of the largest tax cut in our history is the major reason for this growing structural deficit problem.

Asserting some semblance of control over these balloning Federal deficits is absolutely essential to long-term economic growth. Without concerted action, interest rates will stay high and probably increase significantly. There will be a shortage of credit for long-term industrial expansion and other important private sector activities.

Piling up large deficit upon large deficit means that we must borrow from our future to finance our excesses of today. It will require that we pass on to our children a legacy of debt from which they may never recover. This is not the kind of future which we should be seeking for our sons and daughters. We must act effectively and decisively, and act now.

The House Budget Committee, under the able leadership of JIM JONES, has brought before us today for our consideration a 3-year budget reduction plan which seeks to reduce deficits by $182 billion over that 3-year period. While I compliment the members of the Budget Committee for their thorough comprehension of this serious problem, I am disturbed by the 3-year focus in this resolution. I do not believe it accomplishes enough of a reduction in the first year, which we all know is the critical deficit reduction element before us.

When we compare the outyear budget savings under the committee resolution with those under the Reagan budget, we find that there is substantial savings under the committee plan which is not accomplished under the Reagan proposal. But the savings under the committee budget for fiscal year 1985 are only slightly below the Reagan budget. The Congressional Budget Office estimates that the Reagan proposal would result in a $190 billion deficit for fiscal year 1985, while the committee plan would end up with a fiscal year 1985 deficit of $176 billion. By 1987, however, when the Reagan budget would produce deficits of $287 billion, the committee plan would yield a much lower $182 billion deficit.

This difference reflects the fact that the committee has made a serious and important effort to lock in requirements for substantive changes in law which will result in lower outyear deficits, particularly in the critical areas of tax policy through incorporation of the pay-as-you-go concept and in the defense function.

This notwithstanding, I believe we should be doing more this year in this budget resolution to achieve immediate deficit reduction. We must demonstrate to the American people our commitment to outyear sustained deficit reduction efforts.

Moreover, our task is not likely to get any easier in future years. I know that if we are to implement the kind of future budget savings we are going to need, we will be right back here next year pressing a much more extensive budget reduction package than is included in the budget committee proposal. It will be a budget which includes more taxes and which does not exempt any aspect of spending from consideration as part of a deficit reduction package.

I will support the committee resolution in the final analysis if we are unsuccessful in approving an alternative to that resolution here today which addresses the concern I have outlined above regarding larger immediate budget savings in this fiscal year. It is for this reason I intend to support several of the alternative budgets which have been made in order under the rule. At the same time, I cannot support others because of their unrealistic assumptions and the priorities they outline for achieving their savings.

Mr. Chairman, I cannot support the Dannemeyer, Roemer, or Latta budget alternatives which will be brought before us for consideration. In my opinion, some aspects of these alternatives are unrealistic, and in other important ways they deviate from what I consider to be a fair and sensible prioritizing of spending. For the most part, they also assume we can deal with our budget problem without significant revenue raising.

The Dannemeyer alternative, in particular, appears to be unrealistic. Budget reduction is based primarily on the recommendations of the Grace Commission. In addition, this budget alternative projects that defense spending will increase to $372 billion by 1987, a rise of more than 50 percent from actual fiscal year 1983 figures.

A report jointly done by the Congressional Budget Office and the General Accounting Office found that most of the Grace Commission estimates have no merit. Yet, the Dannemeyer budget uses these recommendations as the basis for budget cuts. CBO and GAO could not even prepare budget estimates for 122 of the commission's recommendations it reviewed because the proposals were too vague or necessary data was lacking. Yet, the Dannemeyer budget uses the Grace number for these proposals as deficit reduction measures. Finally, CBO and GAO found that many of the Grace Commission's recommendations for budget savings can only be achieved over a much longer timeframe than is admitted in the Commission report. As such, the Dannemeyer budget-reduction estimates are suspect. In short, I am opposed to the Dannemeyer budget proposal because it is not a serious budget proposal. It relies on unreliable figures to create the impression that our serious deficit crisis can be solved without deep cuts in defense and significant revenue-raising measures.

I also must vote against the Roemer alternative. This alternative, the so-called "2-percent solution" would cut much too deeply into already crippled domestic programs and provide a much too generous growth in defense spending—5 percent over inflation, or about a 9-percent growth in the present defense budget.

We have already made deep, deep cuts in many domestic programs. For example, adjusted for inflation and excluding medicaid, spending on discretionary domestic social programs was 5 percent lower in 1984 than in 1980. Moreover, Federal spending for the poor totals only about 8 percent of the Federal budget. We simply cannot balance on budget on the backs of poor and disadvantaged Americans like the Roemer amendment proposes to attempt.

Finally, for many of the same reasons I must oppose the Dannemeyer and Roemer amendments, I cannot support the alternative to be offered to Mr. LATTA. It comes the closest to the administration position on our budget crisis, which I find wholly unacceptable. It cuts much too deeply into domestic programs, increases defense too much, and relies too heavily on the mythical claims of the Grace Commission to achieve budget reductions.

I intend to support the MacKay and McHugh alternatives to the committee proposal. Both of these alternatives achieve greater near- and long-term savings in an equitable and fair manner.

The MacKay alternative would eliminate the real growth in defense and in certain entitlement programs which is included in the committee resolution. As such, it proposes to limit most Federal spending to 3.5-percent nominal growth, except for social security, means-tested programs, and defense. These would be allowed to grow at the rate of inflation. The $49 billion revenue measure which under the committee budget would go to permit a 3.5-percent real increase in defense and certain low-income programs, would be applied to deficit reduction.

It seems to me that this alternative is preferable to the committee bill for three reasons. First, under this alternative, the fiscal year 1985 deficit will be $170 billion—substantially lower than the Reagan budget of $190 billion and somewhat less than the committee bill. The long-term savings are more extensive than the committee bill, as well, and certainly much more than the Reagan proposal.

Second, since the revenue-raising portion of the MacKay substitute essentially relies on tax increases which the administration has already agreed to sign, it is more achievable.

Finally, this alternative achieves its deficit reduction in what I believe is a fair and sensible way. Defense is not exempted from budget austerity, taxes are increased to reduce the deficit, and we should be able to hold the line on entitlements and discretionary programs to about the level of recent years.

I also intend to support the McHugh substitute to the committee budget. This proposal is designed to achieve the largest deficit realistically possible in the near term and certainly makes far deeper inroads into our outyear problem than any other of the alternatives.

The McHugh alternative would achieve a 3-year budget savings of $262 billion, result in a deficit of $164 billion for fiscal year 1985, and in a deficit of $139 billion in 1987. It would achieve these savings by freezing military spending at inflation-adjusted levels, reducing spending for domestic programs by the same amount as the committee resolution, and raising $76 billion in new revenue.

This alternative comes closest to the type of program which I believe is necessary to address our budget picture. I am, however, concerned that the revenue-raising portion of this alternative is not readily achievable given the attitude of this administration to revenue-raising legislation.

In summary, Mr. Chairman, the decision we make during the next few hours in this Chamber is probably the most significant one we will make this year. I urge my colleagues to vote in favor of meaningful deficit reduction and to reject alternatives which are based on inaccurate assumptions or which ignore the fundamental reality that we must attack from all fronts—raise significant revenue, decrease the increase in defense spending significantly, and implement fairness and compassion with respect to our domestic programs.

I believe there are several alternatives before us today which bring us closer to these objectives and there are several which do not. The choice is ours. The impact of our choice will be felt by our children. We can choose a path of meaningful deficit reduction or we can continue to allow our national debt to grow exponentially and beyond our capacity to ever repay it. We can chose to create an environment conducive to long-term economic growth or one which continues to handicap our very large task of reindustrializing America. I have made my choice. I hope you will join me in taking the path which has been less traveled by meaningful deficit reduction—fairness in deficit reduction which includes defense and taxes.

Mr. MACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNDINE. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. MACK. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The gentleman made the reference to the structural deficit and full employment——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York (Mr. LUNDINE) has expired.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentlewoman from California (Ms. FIEDLER).

Ms. FIEDLER. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, we are here today as grown men and women trying to make some sense out of a process that, frankly, has very little discipline and very little sense. We are looking at a budget that over the next 3 years is going to spend of the taxpayers' money more than $3 trillion.

I would like to repeat that because I think it is really important. We are talking about spending $3 trillion over the next 3 years. I think the sad part of that, when you think of how much money that is, and of course most people cannot even understand what a billion is, no less a trillion, is the fact that we are not effectively solving the problems of the people of our Nation with the huge investment of taxpayers' money that we are making.

I think that when you take a look at that, and you begin to add up how much money we are spending on the revenue side and how short we are going to be, in spite of the fact that we are making serious efforts to try to reduce the deficits by hundreds of billions of dollars, we are still going to fall short over $700 billion between the amount of money which we spend and the amount of money which we bring in.

Again, I want to repeat that: We are going to be short under the best possible circumstances, in 3 years of over $700 billion. Now, that is an amazing figure, when you think about the fact that we are talking about major deficit reductions.

Even if we are successful in enforcing these budgets and implementing them, which I, at this point, after 3 years in the Congress do not believe will actually take place, we still look forward to budget resolutions and tax bills that ultimately will not resolve the problems of the people of our Nation.

So, I guess today the thing that I want to share is that I think that it is time that we seriously reevaluate the entire way in which we invest the taxpayers' money. That instead of building a budget based upon 1930 and 1940 and 1950 priorities, that we instead go back and take a look at where we are today, where we want to be in the future, and do the best that we can as a Congress, not to build on the 1920's, 1930's, or 1940's; but instead try to build for a future that is practical and that is achievable and that will serve the interests of the people of this Nation.

I regret very much that we are making the level of investment that we are making and that we are achieving so little success with it. But it seems to me that it is time to set aside not only the partisan nature of our debate, but also to begin to understand that with this huge investment, not only of the taxpayers' dollars, but of their blood and sweat which goes into earning the money, that it is time that we look very seriously at just what we are doing and make a better effort.

Frankly, if this is the best that can be done, we have got serious problems ahead of us.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. AUCOIN).

Mr. AUCOIN. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, I support the MacKay budget freeze substitute over the McHugh substitute because I believe it is more realistic on the revenue side and it achieves what I think the public wants, a dramatic, definite, major reduction in the deficit.

I want to talk about the job that is facing this House today. It is this: We have got to stop monster deficits before they stop us, before they stop this country.

It does not matter a whole heck of a lot if you back the President who has just proposed a $192 billion deficit for the next fiscal year and simultaneously argues that deficits are unimportant, at least his deficits.

It does not matter if you sit on the Republican side of the aisle and you want people to believe that while we will accumulate more debt under this administration in 4 years than was accumulated since the founding of this Nation, that it is not GOP's fault. It does not matter if you believe that or not.

And it frankly is not good enough if you sit on the Democratic side of the aisle to laugh with partisan glee when the President's own Chief Economic Adviser laid the blame for these deficits squarely on the lap of Reaganomics when he said:

"The things that raise the deficit are defense spending, interest on the national debt, and the tax reduction." That is the Reagan program.

But it does not matter, Mr. Chairman, because when the rhetoric and all the rib nudging is stripped away, the fact remains that we face as Americans, not as Democrats or Republicans, a budget crisis. If we take no action under current policies, the deficit is projected by the CBO to reach $316 billion by fiscal 1989.

That means that if we fail to take drastic action, the projected deficit will eat up nearly 75 percent of the net non-Federal savings by fiscal 1989.

You tell me how a homebuyer or an automobile purchaser or a small businessman or a venture capital firm can make it with a monster deficit of that magnitude.

I think we ought to be very clear about what brought us the deficits of $200 billion a year and more. There are some who would have us believe that the problem is not the President or his particular economic policies, but Congress. I agree it is the Congress.

Back in 1981, we gave him everything he wanted. Back in 1981, the President said that we could cut taxes by $750 billion, increase military spending by $1.6 trillion, whack away at the 17 cents out of every Federal dollar representing discretionary domestic spending, and we would balance the budget by 1984. And Congress went along.

Then we had tax bill on the floor of the House, the President went on TV and said "Support me," our constituents lit up our switchboards and the Congress gave the President his tax bill. I happened to vote against the bill.

Then we had an omnibus reconciliation bill drafted by Mr. Stockman which rearranged the spending priorities requested by the President, added to some programs, eliminated others, and even included some names and phone numbers for good measure—a real piece of legislative craftsmanship. The President again went on TV and said "Support my program," again our switchboards lit up and the Congress gave the President what he wanted. I voted against that bill too.

As the deficit climbed above $100 billion because of the spending increases for the military and the revenue drain resulting from the tax bill, the President agreed that we needed some "revenue enhancement" to prevent the deficit from growing larger. I agreed that we needed to look at those elements of the original Kemp-Roth tax bill which were driving the deficit, but the administration would have none of that. And even though our constituents were starting to become wary of lighting up the switchboards and telling us to support the President, the Congress went along and gave the President a $98 billion revenue enhancement package. I voted against that bill as well.

Now we have the administration's $192 million deficit. The piper has been paid.

But what can be said about an administration which sends budget proposals to the Congress calling for ever-increasing deficits, as this administration has done, and then seeks to amend the Constitution to prevent them from doing that very thing?

That ploy was last year.

This year the administration has submitted a budget with an even higher deficit than last year, and this year's play is a Presidential request for a constitutional line-item veto to curb what he calls excessive spending.

My friends, the President has the equivalent of line-item veto authority now. He has that authority over every line item in the budget that is setting on his desk before he submits it to the Congress. But, instead what we get are these unprecedented deficits which House Republicans have rejected, which the Senate rejected, which everybody rejected and finally that the administration has walked away from.

We do not need a constitutional amendment; we do not need a line-item veto; we do not need anything other than a little bit of political will from all parties.

The situation we face on the floor is a prime example of the problem I have been speaking out against for the last 7 months. We have both sides of the political spectrum subordinating their concern over the deficit to their own ideological agendas.

We have the Latta substitute which cuts into entitlements and discretionary spending, but still allows a substantial—nearly 5 percent real increase—in military spending, and still gives us a deficit of $163 billion in fiscal year 1987. Liberals will say that the increase for defense is too large, the cuts in entitlements and discretionary programs are too deep, and they will vote against the bill.

Then we have the substitute offered by the gentleman from California, Mr. DIXON, on behalf of the Congressional Black Caucus. This substitute reigns in the growth of military spending, protects entitlements, prevents further cuts in domestic programs, but calls for $181 billion in revenues between now and fiscal year 1987. Conservatives will say that the amount for military spending is too low, the taxes which would have to be raised are excessive, and we would still end up with a deficit of $104.1 billion in 1987. And they will vote against the bill.

So I have two fears. First, a repeat of the situation of 2 years ago when none of the various alternatives offered was able to command the majority of votes needed to pass. Second, I am convinced that the ideological rigidity of both sides will allow us to do no more than whittle at the margin of the problem.

So what do we have here? We have paralysis. What we need is some mechanism so that both sides, which have very intense political views, can be presented with a package that has some sacrifice across the world—so that those on the conservative end of the scale can say, yes, I voted to restrain the rate of indexing of the tax cut, which I did not want to do, but in order to do that I got the liberals to go along with some restraints in entitlements. And liberals can say, yes, I voted to make some reductions in social spending, which I did not want, but in return I was able to force more restraint on the conservative side for reductions in military spending.

I believe the only way to put a package like this together is to establish a blue chip, bipartisan commission which will serve as the political heat shield long enough for Congress to enact the package presented. It worked in the case of social security, and it can work now. Obviously, this approach is too late for this year. But it can be a workable plan for next year because after all the shouting is over, here, now, the core problem will remain. The deficit time bomb will keep ticking.

For now, I plan to support the MacKay budget freeze which offers a substantial deficit reduction package while treating entitlements and military spending in an even handed fashion. I hope this proposal will be adopted and we can send a strong signal to the credit markets and the American people that Congress is serious about dealing with our fiscal crisis. Then, real measures will be needed to the kind a bipartisan commission can deliver.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. GINGRICH).

Mr. GINGRICH. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, it is a fascinating process to watch the American body politic wrestle with the deficit and with our economic future. It is a particularly fascinating process to watch our good friends in the Democratic Party who, having wrestled and, having absolute control of the rules of the House and the process of the House, have managed after much gnashing of teeth to come up with six different answers, each of them capable of leading America into some wonderful future.

Their answers range from $181 billion in tax increases, which is sort of the alltime watermark for courageous raids on the American pocketbook, to much more modest efforts to raise taxes.

But one of those two proposals is peculiarly ingenious. if I read the rule correctly. It says that it will be in order as the opening vote to bring up what I understand to be President Reagan's reedited or recalculated budget called the Jones amendment in the rule.

I have a proposal for our friends on the left. You just had a primary yesterday in New York. It looks like Mr. Mondale is doing very well, but Mr. HART hopes to stay in the race. It would be a far more courageous act if, as your first order of business, you would offer a Mondale budget or a Hart budget. After all, you control the House, your Speaker has endorsed Mr. Mondale, and I understand it is conceivable that a gentleman from Colorado may actually offer the first amendment, and he surely would far rather offer Mr. HART's budget.

Let me share with you what the current proposals are. Mr. HART has proposed to raise taxes by more than $100 billion in fiscal year 1989, by more than $300 billion in fiscal years 1985 to 1989. About two-thirds of those tax increases would fall on individual taxpayers. Mr. HART has endorsed other tax increases which would raise billions of dollars more, including a $10-per-barrel oil import fee, which should be a particular joy to our friends from the New England area. The Speaker, I am sure, would like to make in order a budget which would call for a $10-per-barrel oil import fee, which one of his party's major candidates is calling for.

Let me suggest that nothing would hit more directly at the American worker than to approve the Hart budget and to propose to raise taxes by $300 billion through fiscal year 1989.

On the other hand, the Mondale tax proposals are a little more modest. Mr. Mondale has not found quite as many new ideas in terms of raising taxes. Mondale would increase taxes on the American people by about $231 billion between 1985 and 1989, with about two-thirds falling on individual taxpayers. While he has discussed a number of tax issues, the specific proposals included in his budget plan are deferral of indexation, with reforms to protect low and moderate taxpayers, only after deferral, capping the third year of the tax cut, a surtax of 10 percent, and so forth.

The net effect would be that the American people would have $231 billion less in spending in their own budgets because Washington would have $231 billion more to spend under the Mondale budget.

Now, why do we emphasize taxes on the Republican side of the aisle? It is very simple. In 1948, the median American family income tax was $9. In 1983, the median American family income tax was $2,218. The family income had gone up by 7.6 times. Taxes had gone up 246 times.

Most Americans are not very excited about more tax increases. I have a proposal for our friends on the left of the liberal Democratic leadership. Instead of playing games with the Reagan budget, which is now 2 months out of date, instead of trying to score a cheap political point, why do you not offer either of the frontrunners' political budgets? Why do you not bring to the floor your party's likely standard bearer's budget, either the Speaker's candidate, Mr. Mondale, or the gentleman from Colorado's candidate, Mr. HART, and allow the American people to see clearly what your party would do if it were, in fact, in power, because what your party would end up doing is dramatically raising taxes, dramatically hitting working Americans, and dramatically lowering take-home pay.

Mr. MACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I would be delighted to yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. MACK. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, let me just tack on a little bit of information relating to the information that you were talking about a few moments ago, about how the taxes have increased on the American family, the median family.

Some people suggest that the answer to this whole problem is raising taxes. It would be interesting to vote what happens if in fact you wanted to solve the problem by raising taxes. You would have to increase the tax rate from that 9.2 percent to 15.9 percent. That is a 73-percent increase in taxes on the median family in this country.

Maybe that is what the Democrats have in mind, but I do not think that even they would go that far.

Mr. DAUB. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. DAUB. I thank the gentleman for yielding

Mr. Chairman, not only do I find useful and instructive what the gentleman is saying to us in the Chamber now, but I would like to make a point and ask a question.

In 1976 when the Ford administration left office, the numbers on unemployment, interest rates, and inflation were quite healthy in our country, if the gentleman from Georgia will recall, and some criticized the newly elected President's administration because in the first or second year he promised so much, he tried to deliver so much, that they overstimulated the capability of the productivity of the workers to fulfill his promises.

Is the gentleman now saying that if it were in order under the rule, that the Hart budget or the Mondale budget might just lead us on that kind of collision course, but the majority in this House does not even want to make it in order under the rule?

Mr. GINGRICH. I think there are good, historical reasons why Mr. HART managed George McGovern's campaign and why Mr. Mondale served with Mr. Carter. I think both of them favor massive tax increases. Both of them delight in spending money in Washington, and I think, frankly, our friends on the left do not have the courage to come to this House and bring us a budget which their standard bearer would be proud of. I do not think they have the courage to go back home and say, "Why do you not vote for a Hart budget, which as I said would be an increase of about $300 billion in taxes over the next 5 years," or "Why do you not vote for a Mondale budget, which will be an increase of $231 billion?"

I just think that since they control the House, rather than have them take a cheap shot at Reagan, they ought to take an open shot at their own candidate and allow the American people to look at the tax opportunities.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I would be delighted to yield to my distinguished friend from Philadelphia.

Mr. GRAY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, certainly as I listened to the gentleman's comments and I heard him mentioning candidates and why they do not have a budget to offer on this floor, I noticed that there was one candidate on our side who was left out, and that was Jesse Jackson.

Does the gentleman not consider his budget relevant? Since you want a Hart and Mondale budget, I believe that we should be willing to provide another budget of a person who ran for President 4 years ago, I think his name was BUSH, and we could offer that one as well. Would you be willing to make that in order?

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Chairman, if I may reclaim my time, I think the gentleman has made an excellent point. I happen to think, frankly, that my assumption, which may have been totally unfair—and I hope the gentleman would be glad to enlighten us on that—was that the gentleman from California (Mr. DIXON) would be speaking for a broad sense of the values and concerns about which the gentleman speaks, and since the Black Caucus budget had been made in order, while Mr. Mondale and Mr. HART were not allowed to have a budget made in order, that the Black Caucus in a broad sense was representing the general values and concerns of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Chairman, I would just like to point out to the gentleman from Georgia that although we do have 21 black Members of the House of Representatives, the Congressional Black Caucus budget, will not necessarily represent the Jackson budget because he also happens to be black. Are we to assume that someone here would offer the Hart and Mondale budgets simply because of the color of their skin.

Mr. GINGRICH. Let me just say this in answer to that——

Mr. GRAY. I would hope that the gentleman would say in his comment that he would want to see the Jackson budget in order.

Mr. GINGRICH. I would love to see the Jackson budget offered, and I am sure the gentleman would join me in looking forward to see how many of his friends on his side of the aisle would have the courage to join him in a rainbow coalition in voting for the Jackson budget. But I will say this to the gentleman: That even the front-runners—and I happen to think it is a three-man race, and out of the three, the most articulate and most interesting happens to be Mr. Jackson—but of the two front-runners, I will say to the gentleman that I doubt that either of them, if your leadership had the courage to offer their budgets this afternoon, could get a majority of the votes on your side for a budget, even the more moderate budget of Mr. Mondale's for $231 billion in tax increases or the more liberal budget of Mr. HART's for $300 billion of tax increases. I doubt if either of those budgets would get a majority of the votes on the gentleman's side of the aisle.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Chairman, I look forward to what happens on the gentleman's side of the aisle with regard to the Reagan budget. That will be most interesting.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Chairman, later on, if the gentleman's leadership gives him some time, I will be glad to continue this dialog.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. GINGRICH) has expired.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. ROEMER).

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the chairman of our Budget Committee for yielding me the 2 minutes.

I wanted to address something that has come up on several occasions during our most interesting debate this afternoon on our country, its economy, and where we are headed. I put these in the column that I call in my daily notes "myths with which we have to deal."

I have heard at least three today, often stated over and over again.

Myth No. 1 is that the deficits really do not make any difference, that there is no hurry; we have been living with them for some time; it is not anybody's fault that we have these districts. Surely it is not the President's; certainly it is not the Congress; definitely it is not from military spending; certainly it is not from reductions in taxes; no, it is not because of uncontrolled social spending. We are told that deficits really do not make that much difference; it is good political talk.

That is a myth. That is just not true. The third largest item in the budget is interest on the national debt. The deficits are burying us.

The second myth is this: Growth can solve this problem. They say, "Don't worry. All we have to do is grow out of this temporary problem."

I looked at the President's budget that he submitted in February. I like the President. I am like most Americans. I wish him well, and I try to follow him. He submitted a budget that had growth at its center, and it had a larger deficit 3 years from now than today.

Let us not fool ourselves. It is a myth of our times that we can just grow our way out of this problem.

Growth is important, growth is essential, growth is critical. We certainly must not impede growth, but growth alone without tax reformation, growth alone without nondefense discipline, and growth alone without reining in the generals will not solve the deficit problem.

The third myth that I have heard is that reductions in the deficit of the size needed to move the markets down in interest rates can come quickly, easily, and without pain. That is not true.

Any budget that comes to this floor that tells us it is going to reduce enough out of the deficit to make a difference in interest rates without touching entitlements is not telling us the truth.

Some day either you or your successor is going to walk on this floor and face 50 percent of the budget and say, "By golly, we don't have a choice. We've got to restrict entitlement programs."

This will not be without pain. But the bottom line for me is that we must ask something from all Americans. We should cut the military back, freeze domestic spending, and trim entitlements slightly.

If we ask something from all Americans, we might gain something from that sacrifice—lower interest rates, better growth, and more jobs for our kids.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SHUSTER).

Mr. SHUSTER. Mr. Chairman, there is an issue before us within these various budget proposals which might be called the "Truth in Transportation Trust Fund Spending," and the different proposals before us treat that matter in different ways.

I would emphasize that I think this particular issue by itself is no reason for voting for or against any of the budgets before us, but I do believe it is a matter which should be considered by the Members because I think we are dealing with an issue that has some ethical relationship to keeping faith with the American people. I believe an ethical case can be made that the budget authority limitations which normally apply to general fund spending should not arbitrarily apply to spending from the various transportation trust funds if indeed surpluses are being built up on those trust funds.

The Members will recall that we acted just a few years ago to increase the highway taxes on the American people, increasing them by 4 cents. We increased highway-dedicated trust fund taxes on the American people and dedicated 1 cent to transit, and we reimposed the 8-percent tax on aviation for tickets and dedicated that to the aviation trust fund.

Why did we do this? We did this because we believed there were very significant needs out there to improve America's highways and transit and aviation systems. So we taxed the American people and we told them in effect that we will dedicate these taxes and put them in trust funds so they will be spent for the specific purposes of improving America's transportation system.

Now where do we find ourselves? We find ourselves in the position that the Mass Transit Trust Fund again is building a surplus whereby, according to CBO, from a $520 million balance in that trust fund today, that will go up through 1990 to $3.3 billion.

In the Highway Trust Fund we have a scandalous balance of $9 billion, money that we have taken out of the pockets of the people and are not spending for the purposes it was meant to be spent, and over the next 5 years that will decline to about $3.2 billion, as it should. And in aviation we have a balance of $4.8 billion, and that will rise to a $10.2 billion surplus in the Aviation Trust Fund by 1990.

Mr. Chairman, I suggest it is wrong, dead wrong, for us to tax the American people and say we are going to spend it for transportation purposes, put it in a trust fund where it can only be spent for those purposes, and then let these enormous surpluses build.

If we are not going to spend the money, we should reduce the taxes, or if we have the money there, we should spent it for the dedicated purposes.

I regret to inform the House that only three of the budgets before us today do provide for the expenditure of funds from the trust funds if there are surpluses in the trust fund above and beyond arbitrary budget authority.

Those three proposals are the McHugh substitute, the MacKay-Nelson substitute and the Jones substitute.

Now, I surely do not stand here and argue that you should vote for or against any one of these budgets simply because of this issue; but I do argue that you should be aware of these factors when you consider the various eight proposals before us. It is dead wrong for us to build up these surpluses. We are violating a commitment we made to the American people. It is ethically wrong to say we are going to tax them for dedicated purposes and then withhold that spending, and what is ethically wrong cannot be politically right.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHUSTER. I am happy to yield to my friend.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Since the gentleman was instrumental in having this provision put in the committee bill, I want to correct some misinterpretations that this is a raid on the Treasury. There are some people who are thinking that this money is going to breech the budget and can be used for other purposes.

This provision in the committee budget is a pay-as-you-go provision and it says so long as those trust funds are self-sufficient, the moneys can be used only for that dedicated purpose and not for other purposes.

Mr. SHUSTER. The gentleman is absolutely right, and beyond that, under the law, the so-called Byrd amendment, which is part of the law, prohibits deficit spending out of the trust fund, so there is no way there can be deficit spending in the transportation trust fund.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. HUCKABY).

Mr. HUCKABY. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Oklahoma for yielding me this time.

We find ourselves this afternoon for the first time during the 8 years I have been here engaged in a miniwar with some eight different proposals before us in an effort to see who can cut the budget the most.

This is finally a step in the right direction. The polls throughout America are showing us that Americans on Main Street are finally more concerned about these huge deficits than any other issue facing the American public.

I find myself able for the first time in the 8 years that I have been here to support the proposal before us from the Budget Committee. I want to commend the Budget Committee for coming out with what I consider to be a balanced middle-of-the-road approach. It is virtually a standstill freeze budget.

It is true there is a tax increase of almost $50 billion, but it is to pay for additional defense spending of some $44 billion and only $5 billion of additional domestic increases.

There is only one fallacy in the committee's proposal. It fails to address entitlements. Entitlements account for more than one-third of the expenditures of our budget. Until we face up and have the political courage to say we are going to slow the rate of increase—I am not suggesting cutting anybody's social security check or any other type check, but we are going to have to slow the rate of increase if we are ever going to get these deficits truly under control, so that our generation—our generation will pay our way and not leave these deficits to our children, because our interest rate continues to mount each year. It is over $100 billion already, over $100 billion. It continues to increase, compounding the problems that our children are going to have. We have got to face these problems.

Ms. FIEDLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUCKABY. I yield to the gentlewoman.

Ms. FIEDLER. The gentleman made a comment before that there was $49 billion in tax increases and those tax increases were to pay for increased defense. This is the first time that I have heard that the Democratic budget has tax increases of $49 billion and the purpose of it is to pay for defense.

I just wanted to get that clarified by the gentleman in the well. I thought that was interesting, since most of the Democrats have been cutting defense, rather than raising taxes to fund it.

Mr. HUCKABY. Well, if the gentlewoman will look at the figures, we are proposing an increase, a real increase of $44 billion in defense, the committee budget as such. The proposed increase in new revenues is $50 billion.

Ms. FIEDLER. I am very pleased to hear they are willing to fund defense, because I thought they were raising taxes to fund other programs.

Mr. HUCKABY. There is only a $5-billion increase in other programs.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Florida (Mr. NELSON), a distinguished member of the Budget Committee.

Mr. NELSON of Florida. Mr. Chairman, now we are at the time in which hard choices have to be made. During an election year, most of those choices are harder. But clearly the American people are telling us, and we had better listen, that they want the deficits reduced.

Before us are a number of choices. I will propose one offered by the gentleman from Florida (Mr. MACKAY) and myself, a simple freeze across the board.

Take 1984 spending and freeze it. Then allow a 3.5-percent increase on everything for 1985. For social security, defense, a $16 billion increase from 1984 spending levels, and safety net programs, allow an inflation increase. Finally, include the Ways and Means Committee tax package to be used only for deficit reduction. The total deficit reduction for 3 years will be $234 billion.

If we start with the 1984 spending levels and enact a modified spending freeze, all programs share in spending restraint.

The bottom line is that to reduce the deficit, there must be restraint in spending increases.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Washington (Mr. LOWRY), a distinguished member of the Budget Committee.

Mr. LOWRY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I thank the chairman of the committee for yielding me this time and I want to congratulate him and the rest of the committee on an excellent job.

I thought earlier today as people kept talking about how we are not going to be dealing with the deficit, they would point something out that I think needs to be pointed out. The base line in which every budget is starting with, the budget that came from downtown, the budget in the Senate, the budget here, and every one of our budget alternatives here is not an honest base line—because what are we starting with?

Well, we are starting with the President's defense request as reestimated and we are starting with CBO on the domestic programs, so that is why we all get these gigantic reduction packages, and I want to point out this applies to the ones I support as well as other alternatives.

As we were talking about how we are not doing enough about the deficits, I thought somebody was going to point that out.

Something I found astounding as I began studying this year's budget is that using this base line, if we did nothing, if we did nothing but just account for inflation in every program of the Federal budget, defense through social security and everything else, and never raised one dime of taxes, we would under that base line reduce the deficit over 3 years by $158 billion; $9 billion more, for instance, than what was announced down at the Rose Garden the other day as the President and Senate Republicans budget; but if we did nothing, if we just gave inflation to defense, gave inflation to social security and everything else there is and not pass a dime increase, as defined by changing the tax law, we would reduce the deficit under this base line by $158 billion.

Now, I would like to point out that as we go through and look at the various different options before us, and being one like just about everybody in this House that thinks we have to get these deficits down and we have to get them down in the next year to be able to avoid the problems affecting interest rates, which I will talk about, the first budget I am going to be voting for is the Dixon Congressional Black Caucus budget, because the Dixon Black Caucus budget reduces the deficit next year by $56.5 billion.

Well, the Dixon budget reduces the deficit in the first year, 1985, $56.5 billion.

The McHugh alternative, also known as the DSG budget, reduces the deficit next year $41 billion. Now, that is not quite far enough, but that is at least getting into the ball game of what is necessary. I will vote for that alternative.

The Budget Committee resolution that I will support if the Dixon or McHugh budgets do not prevail reduces the deficit the first year $31 billion. That is not enough reduction in the deficit but it is twice as good as the lesser deficit reduction of the President's budget of first year reductions of $16.

Mr. DAUB. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOWRY of Washington. I will yield to my friend.

Mr. DAUB. I owe you indeed a market compliment. Indeed there is a subcommittee of the Rules Committee, sort of ex officio, but appointed by the Speaker, chaired by the very able gentleman from California (Mr. BEILENSON), studying the very, very interesting point of common baseline usage in all budgeting. You might call it truth in budgeting.

Mr. LOWRY of Washington. Right.

Mr. DAUB. Rather they pay as you go.

The effort is being made by 15 Democrats and 10 Republicans to arrive at a method by which we can handle it. So I compliment the gentleman for calling that to our attention, and there is a subcommittee of the Rules Committee working now and has issued a report that may very well get us to that after we get done with this experience we are having this week in the House.

Mr. LOWRY of Washington. That is extremely important and I thank the gentleman for that.

I will point out all of the budgets before us are using the same baseline. It is just a baseline that really is not what I call reducing the deficit nearly far enough. I ask support of the Budget Committee budget.

● Mr. BEILENSON. Mr. Chairman, I commend Chairman JONES and the members of the Budget Committee for the excellent work they have done in presenting to the House a deficit reduction plan which is, on the whole, balanced and realistic. However, I want to express my objections to one of the procedural provisions included in House Concurrent Resolution 280, the so-called pay-as-you-go trust fund amendment.

The pay-as-you-go trust fund amendment was included at the request of supporters of the Federal highway, mass transit, aviation, and Superfund trust fund programs who feared that spending limits set by the resolution would preclude increasing spending for those programs up to the amounts available from revenues paid into the trust funds. Those supporters argued that the legislation which increased the revenues for those programs carried an implicit promise that the higher revenues would be used for the purposes for which the trust funds were established. They maintained that not allowing for increased spending up to the levels of the increased revenues would constitute a breach of that promise.

The Budget Committee accepted these arguments, but rather than increasing the spending levels in House Concurrent Resolution 280 to match the level of anticipated revenues for those trust funds, the committee adopted a procedural provision exempting those programs from the budget controls which will be applied to other spending legislation.

The pay-as-you-go trust fund amendment states that new spending from those trust funds shall be disregarded for the purposes of spending levels established in the budget resolution and for the purposes of determining whether a committee has exceeded its section 302(a) allocation of discretionary spending. This means that no legislation which provides new spending from these trust funds—up to the level of revenues in the trust fund—can cause a committee to exceed its section 302(a) allocation. Since section 5(b) of House Concurrent Resolution 282 provides that the section 311 point of order—against legislation which would breach the total spending levels set in the budget resolution—shall not apply if the legislation does not cause a committee to exceed its section 302(a) allocation, the pay-as-you-go trust fund amendment effectively exempts legislation concerning these trust funds from the section 311 control on spending.

This exemption is unprecedented. Never before has a certain class of legislation been specifically exempted in advance from the control on overall spending. It is easy to imagine, moreover, that having effectively exempted these trust funds from any Budget Act control, we will either see all kinds of programs converted to trust funds, or we will be asked in the future to accord similar privileges for other classes of legislation.

I personally favor increasing spending for highways, mass transit, aviation, and hazardous waste cleanups, but I believe that such spending should be provided for in a straightforward and honest way, by making room for it in the budget resolution. We should not leave out of our budget totals, spending that we support and that we expect to allow, only to make that spending possible later on in the year by exempting it from Budget Act controls. To do so fuels the arguments of critics who charge that we are adopting a phony budget resolution.

I also want to express my hope that this will be the last year we consider a budget resolution which contains significantly different procedures for implementing the budget process than those called for by the Budget Act. While some of the procedures adopted pursuant to the elastic clause and now used as a matter of practice—such as reconciliation—have improved the process, the way in which we have adopted such new procedures has been one of the most troublesome aspects of our budget process. If Congress is going to operate under procedures which are substantially different from those described by the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, then we should amend the Budget Act permanently—not on an ad hoc, year-to-year basis, as we are doing now.

We shall have the opportunity to amend the Budget Act to reflect the views of a broad base of Members on how our budget process should operate if the Rules Committee acts expeditiously on H.R. 5247. That legislation embodies the recommendations of the Rules Committee Task Force on the Budget Process, which spent 2 years reviewing issues surrounding the budget process and developing proposals to resolve them. While this is not the time to explain this legislation in detail, I do want to point out that if our task force proposal is enacted, it should substantially eliminate the need to use the elastic clause to make procedural changes. When such ad hoc procedural changes are warranted, our proposal will provide for more careful review and consideration of them prior to their adoption. We will thus be less likely to include procedures which damage the credibility of the process, such as the pay-as-you-go trust fund exemption contained in the Budget Committee's recommended resolution we are considering today.●

● Mrs. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, this budget resolution offers us the opportunity to live up to our responsibilities. Many of the speakers tonight have posed the questions "Is this proposal workable?" "Is it equitable?", "Is it effective?". The answer to all of these is "Yes."

No; it is not painless. It calls upon everyone, except those at the very bottom of the economic ladder to make reasonable sacrifices. It matches every dollar in increased tax revenues with $2 in spending cuts. It addresses reasonably and practically both defense and entitlement programs. Above all, it contains the largest deficit reduction in a package that is at once achievable and equitable.

But, I would suggest that there is one other question that we should respond to while we consider this budget: "When are we going to have the courage to come up here to Washington and do what our constituents expect of us—reign in Federal spending, control the deficit and lay the basis of long-term economic growth?"

All it is going to take to accomplish this is for all of us to lay aside partisanship, accept some painful but necessary slowdowns in some of our pet programs, and try, at least for this one time, to work together for the good of this Nation.●

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATTA) has 9 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. JONES) has 14 minutes remaining.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire, does the gentleman have any more speakers or does the gentleman care to yield back his time? We have no more speakers.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of our time.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to House Resolution 476, the concurrent resolution is considered as having been read for amendment under the 5-minute rule.

The text of the concurrent resolution is as follows:

H. CON. RES. 280

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Congress hereby determines and declares that the concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1984 is hereby revised and replaced, the first concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1985 is hereby established, and the appropriate budgetary levels for fiscal years 1986 and 1987 are hereby set forth:

(a) The following budgetary levels are appropriate for the fiscal years beginning on October 1, 1983, October 1, 1984, October 1, 1985, and October 1, 1986:

(1) The recommended levels of Federal revenues are as follows:

Fiscal year 1984: $664,900,000,000.
Fiscal year 1985: $742,700,000,000.
Fiscal year 1986: $812,550,000,000.
Fiscal year 1987: $885,950,000,000.

and the amounts by which the aggregate levels of Federal revenues should be increased are as follows:

Fiscal year 1984: $1,900,000,000.
Fiscal year 1985: $9,700,000,000.
Fiscal year 1986: $17,650,000,000.
Fiscal year 1987: $22,450,000,000.

(2) The appropriate levels of total new budget authority are as follows:

Fiscal year 1984: $915,500,000,000.
Fiscal year 1985: $1,002,100,000,000.
Fiscal year 1986: $1,087,950,000,000.
Fiscal year 1987: $1,179,250,000,000.

(3) The appropriate levels of total budget outlays are as follows:

Fiscal year 1984: $853,900,000,000.
Fiscal year 1985: $918,150,000,000.
Fiscal year 1986: $984,850,000,000.
Fiscal year 1987: $1,067,950,000,000.

(4) The amounts of the deficits in the budget which are appropriate in the light of economic conditions and all other relevant factors are as follows:

Fiscal year 1984: $189,000,000,000.
Fiscal year 1985: $175,450,000,000.
Fiscal year 1986: $172,300,000,000.
Fiscal year 1987: $182,000,000,000.

(5) The appropriate levels of the public debt are as follows:

Fiscal year 1984: $1,595,800,000,000.

RECONCILIATION

SEC. 2. (a) Not later than May 1, 1984, the House committees named in subsections (b) through (l)(1) of this section shall submit their recommendations to the House Budget Committee. After receiving those recommendations, the Committee on the Budget shall report to the House a reconciliation bill or resolution or both carrying out all such recommendations without any substantive revision.

(b) The House Committee on Agriculture shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority by $50,000,000 and outlays by $50,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of budget authority by $800,000,000 and outlays by $800,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of budget authority by $1,700,000,000 and outlays by $1,700,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(c) The House Committee on Armed Services shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce outlays by $300,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of outlays by $650,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of outlays by $1,000,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(d) The House Committee on Education and Labor shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce outlays by $150,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of outlays by $150,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of outlays by $200,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(e) The House Committee on Energy and Commerce shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority by $1,000,000,000 and outlays by $1,000,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of budget authority by $1,350,000,000 and outlays by $1,350,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of budget authority by $1,650,000,000 and outlays by $1,650,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(f) The House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce outlays by $550,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of outlays by $1,300,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of outlays by $1,800,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(g) The House Committee on Small Business shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee sufficient to reduce outlays by $200,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of $150,000,000 in budget authority and $200,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of $250,000,000 in budget authority and $200,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1987.

(h) The House Committee on Veterans' Affairs shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority by $150,000,000 and outlays by $400,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of budget authority by $50,000,000 and outlays by $250,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of budget authority by $250,000,000 and outlays by $250,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(i)(1) The House Committee on Ways and Means shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority by $1,000,000,000 and outlays by $1,000,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of budget authority by $1,400,000,000 and outlays by $1,400,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of budget authority by $1,750,000,000 and outlays by $1,750,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(2) The House Committee on Ways and Means shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee sufficient to increase revenues by $9,700,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires increases of $17,650,000,000 in revenues in fiscal year 1986; and requires increases of $22,450,000,000 in revenues in fiscal year 1987.

GENERAL PROVISIONS

SEC. 3. (a) For fiscal years 1985, 1986, and 1987, any revenues raised by legislation enacted on or after March 15, 1984, shall only be used to reduce the Federal budget deficits for such fiscal years except to the extent that such legislation earmarks all or any part of such revenues for specific spending programs.

(b) Pursuant to subsection (a) of this section and notwithstanding the spending levels contained in section 1 of this resolution, funding for specific low-income programs, such as—

(1) an employment initiative for disadvantaged youth;

(2) public works jobs for community renewal;

(3) increased funding for the Aid to Families with Dependent Children program and the State component of the Supplemental Security Income program to ensure that the purchasing power of recipients is maintained;

(4) increased funding for title XX of the Social Security Act; and would be appropriate if the authorizations for such programs are enacted and if sufficient revenues or outlay reductions are also enacted to ensure that the legislation is deficit neutral.

(5) an increase in the earned income tax credit;

ADMINISTRATIVE SAVINGS

SEC. 4. It is the sense of the Congress that the Executive Branch achieve at least $2 billion in savings over fiscal years 1985 through 1987 by implementing those recommendations of the President's Private Sector Survey on Cost Control requiring administrative action within that branch of Government. It is further the sense of the Congress that the President shall report to Congress each year, in conjunction with the annual budget submission, on the progress made in achieving the savings required by this section.

AUTOMATIC SECOND BUDGET RESOLUTION

SEC. 5. (a) If Congress has not completed action by October 1, 1984, on the concurrent resolution on the budget required to be reported under section 310(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 for the 1985 fiscal year, then this concurrent resolution shall be deemed to be the concurrent resolution required to be reported under section 310(a) of such Act, for the purposes of the prohibitions contained in section 311 of such Act, notwithstanding congressional action or inaction on any reconciliation requirements contained in this concurrent resolution.

(b) Section 311(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, as made applicable by subsection (a) of this section, shall not apply to bills, resolutions, or amendments within the jurisdiction of a committee, or any conference report on any such bill or resolution, if—

(1) the enactment of such bill or resolution as reported;

(2) the adoption and enactment of such amendment; or

(3) the enactment of such bill or resolution in the form recommended in such conference report;

would not cause the appropriate allocation for such committee of new discretionary budget authority or new spending authority as described in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 made pursuant to section 302(a) of such Act for fiscal year 1985 to be exceeded.

(c) The provisions of this section shall cease to apply when Congress completes action on a subsequent concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1985 pursuant to section 304 or 310 of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974.

"PAY AS YOU GO" TRUST FUND AMENDMENT

SEC. 6. (a) For purposes of the spending levels for fiscal year 1985 contained in section 1 of this resolution, and the assumptions upon which they are based, and for purposes of determining whether or not a committee exceeds its section 302(a) allocation of new discretionary budget authority or new spending authority for the prohibition contained in section 5 of this resolution, any new discretionary budget authority or new spending authority contained in a bill, resolution, amendment, or conference report shall be disregarded if the budget authority for outlays which will result from such new discretionary budget authority or such new spending authority is derived from any trust fund—

(1) the expenditures from which are available for highway, mass transit, or aviation purposes;

(2) for which new or expanded user fees or taxes were enacted during the 97th Congress; and

(3) which is described in section 401(d)(1)(B) of the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Act of 1974.

(b) For purposes of the spending levels for fiscal year 1985 contained in section 1 of this resolution, and the assumptions upon which they are based, and for purposes of determining whether or not a committee exceeds its section 302(a) allocation of new discretionary budget authority or new spending authority for the prohibition contained in section 5 of this resolution, any new discretionary budget authority contained in a bill, resolution, amendment, or conference report to fund programs under the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act of 1980 shall be disregarded to the extent that such bill, resolution, amendment, or conference report contains revenue sufficient to cover such new spending, or to the extent that sufficient revenue to cover such increases is included in the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation and Liability Act of 1980.

SECTION 302(b) FILING REQUIREMENT

SEC. 7. (a) It shall not be in order in the House of Representatives to consider any bill or resolution, or amendment thereto, providing—

(1) new budget authority for fiscal year 1985;

(2) new spending authority described in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act first effective in fiscal year 1985; or within the jurisdiction of any committee which has received an allocation pursuant to section 302(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of discretionary budget authority or new spending authority, as described above, for such fiscal year, unless and until such committee makes the allocation or subdivisions required by section 302(b) of the Congressional Budget Act, in connection with the most recently agreed to concurrent resolution on the budget.

(3) direct loan authority, primary loan guarantee authority, or secondary loan guarantee authority for fiscal year 1985;

(b) The prohibition contained in subsection (a) shall not apply until twenty-one days of continuous session, as defined in section 1011(5) of the Impoundment Control Act of 1974, after Congress completes action on this concurrent resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to House Resolution 476, no amendments are in order except the following amendments, which shall be considered only in the following order, shall not be subject to amendment, shall be considered as having been read, and shall be debatable as specified in House Resolution 476:

Second, the amendment printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 3, 1984, by, and if offered by, Representative DANNEMEYER;

Third, the amendment printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 3, 1984, by, and if offered by, Representative ROEMER;

Fourth, an amendment in the nature of a substitute consisting of the text of House Concurrent Resolution 281, if offered by Representative DIXON;

Fifth, the amendment printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 3, 1984, by, and if offered by, Representative MCHUGH;

Sixth, the amendment printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 3, 1984, by Representative MACKAY, and if offered by Representative MACKAY or Representative NELSON;

Seventh, the amendment printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 3, 1984, by, and if offered by, Representative LATTA; and Eighth, an amendment in the nature of a substitute consisting of the text of House Concurrent Resolution 280 as introduced, if offered by Representative JONES of Oklahoma, which shall be in order only if at least one of the amendments designated above has been adopted. It shall also be in order to consider the amendment or amendments provided for in section 305(a)(6) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, necessary to achieve mathematical consistency.

AMENDMENT IN THE NATURE OF A SUBSTITUTE OFFERED BY MR. WIRTH

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute designated as No. 1 in the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will designate the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The text of the amendment in the nature of a substitute is as follows:

Amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by Mr. WIRTH: Strike all after the resolving clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the Congress hereby determines and declares that the concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1984 is hereby revised and replaced, the first concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1985 is hereby established, and the appropriate budgetary levels for fiscal years 1986 and 1987 are hereby set forth:

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to House Resolution 476, the amendment is considered as having been read.

The gentleman from Colorado (Mr. WIRTH) will be recognized for 30 minutes, and a Member opposed will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from Colorado (Mr. WIRTH) for 30 minutes.

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment in the nature of a substitute made in order under the rule at this point is the President's fiscal year 1985 budget which he submitted to us on February 1.

As pointed out, the rule permits any Member to offer the President's budget at this point, and I am offering the amendment because as far as I know no Member of the minority had wanted to offer the President's budget as an amendment.

I would like to ask the chairman of the Budget Committee if I might, if he knows of any member of the minority who has asked to offer the President's budget as an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIRTH. I am happy to yield.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. To my knowledge, no member of the minority has asked to offer the President's budget. I would say that it was recommended to me that this budget be printed in the RECORD because in each of the last 2 years the President's budget was submitted and nobody has offered it. And even though it was made in order last year it was not offered. The President later criticized us for not dealing with his budget and I did not want to run the risk of a similar criticism again this year.

Mr. WIRTH. I thank the chairman.

The amendment in the nature of a substitute made in order under the rule at this point is the President's fiscal year 1985 budget, which he submitted to us on February 1.

The rule permits any Member to offer the President's budget at this point. I am offering the amendment because, as far as I know, no member of the minority wanted to offer the amendment. I would like to ask the chairman of the Budget Committee if he knows of any member of the minority asking to offer the President's budget as an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. Chairman, since no member of the minority wishes to offer the President's budget, I will do so. As required under the rule, the amendment is in the same form in which it was printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 3.

I offer this amendment for one purpose only: so that the House gives full consideration to the budget proposals submitted to us by the President of the United States.

For the past 2 years, the President has complained that the Congress—both this House and the other body—have failed to give full consideration to his budgets.

In his nationally televised address on the budget on May 8, 1982, President Reagan said that his fiscal year 1983 budget proposal "which the Congress refused to act on * * * would, if adopted, drastically reduce the deficits."

The President expressed the same concern again last year.

In his press conference of May 27, 1983, the President said:

> The budget proposal that we submitted to the Congress, and which in both Houses they refused to consider . . . actually would have put us on a declining deficit . . . where you could see a balanced budget coming up.

In both 1982 and 1983, President Reagan criticized the Congress for refusing to consider and act on his budget. I am this evening offering the President's fiscal year 1985 budget, so that the President and the American people will know that we considered and acted upon President Reagan's budget.

Mr. Chairman, I offer the President's fiscal year 1985 budget so that the House may clearly consider it, on the record.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Chairman, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Colorado (Mr. WIRTH) yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. WIRTH. I will be happy to yield to the gentleman for a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the Chair to ascertain whether the gentleman seeking recognition to offer this Jones amendment is in favor of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the gentleman does not have to qualify. Any member can offer the amendment as provided by the rule.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIRTH. I will be happy to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. I thank my colleague for yielding.

I cannot help but note that in the President's budget as originally presented contained a level for defense spending of $272 billion for 1985. Yet the thing that puzzles me and causes me to question my colleague from Colorado at this time is that the Democratic leadership budget of the Budget Committee has a defense spending level of $255.9 billion.

So I have to ask my colleague when the defense appropriation bill comes along for consideration on its merits do you intend to support the level of spending for defense of $272 billion that is now in the budget process you are speaking to?

Mr. WIRTH. If the gentleman will yield back, what we do on the defense appropriation bill I do not think is relevant. We are on the budget resolution right now. I believe that that is the business in front of the Congress this evening, the budget resolution.

I am sure that I, like the gentleman from California and all of our colleagues, will consider the defense appropriation bill at the appropriate time.

Mr. Chairman, I do not have any further requests for time on our side and I will reserve the balance of my time at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado (Mr. WIRTH) has consumed 5 minutes and reserves the balance of his time.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MICHEL) is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I think at the outset of this 2-day budget marathon one among us must probably extend a word of sympathy to those in the press who are obliged to follow this process and to the American people who have to tolerate it.

I think I would prefer to be here today considering legislation to abolish the budget process and go back to the basics of authorizing and appropriating. Congressional budgeting has turned out to be a farce and a total bust.

If you need proof, look at what we have before us. Originally when word first leaked out about the Budget Committee plan, I described it as the Tulsa two-step. It appeared to be a rather inventive little jig, one part designed to catch the eye of the majority party's midsection, and the other part to catch the eye of the good people of Oklahoma.

Now, instead of a simple two-step we have got some footwork on this floor that makes the moves in "Flashdance" look like a walk in the park.

Now let us see—I still have not gotten all of them straight. There is pay-as-you-go plan.

There is one with lower interest rates and another with no real growth in spending.

Then there is the freeze and, of course, eventually there is a committee version.

There is something for everybody. It is a smorgasbord for schizophrenics. Anybody can eat at this table, and several times if they wish. It reminds me of that old refrain used in some areas out in my home State of Illinois on election day: vote early and be sure to vote often.

Now, I could even let all of this creative accounting pass if it were not for the alternative we have before us first.

If you need a reason to think seriously about abandoning the budget process, this is it.

The chairman has had printed in the RECORD, along with the other proposals, the outdated budget recommendations of the administration from last February.

This is not the President's budget plus the Rose Garden compromise, mind you. It is the original submission to the Congress, which the President, in a good faith effort to make a downpayment on the deficit, has himself agreed to scrap.

Now why do you suppose the old administration budget is before us?

What is the rationale for using up precious debate time on a budget the President has already revised?

What is the rationale for prohibiting votes on some budget options our own Members sought to offer while forcing a vote on a package that is no longer relevant to these deliberations?

Let me spell it out for you very briefly. The budget process is being used, I should say abused, in a way to embarrass the President and embarrass House Republicans.

Ten years of congressional budgeting and we are down to this; doing whatever it takes to embarrass the other side. I assume the Reagan budget was pulled from the shelf and dusted off so it could be defeated on the floor.

If that is all you want out of our deliberations I am happy to oblige. I have asked all of the Members on my side simply to vote "No."

Let us call it a symbolic vote against the chicanery that is being played out here. Let us call it a symbolic vote against the partisanship that is so pervasive in this Chamber.

Let us call it tit for tat.

Is it any wonder why the American people, or those who make decisions about interest rates do not put much faith in our ability to get something done around here?

Time's a wastin'.

Let us get this over and done with.

And while those who must are playing politics with the President's budget, the rest of us can be thinking about what I said.

It is time to rethink what we are doing and what it accomplishes in the end. The end product is supposed to be a good product.

That means the process must be worthy of its goals.

And I guess if I had my druthers, I would much rather in the future, if we are going to continue with the Budget Act, have whatever the majority offers; have a substitute on the part of the minority, give each side opportunities with perfecting amendments to really get a product in the end that you can make a clean cut choice, one against the other.

But what we have here today in my judgment, is a sham and a charade. Nobody is going to know in the end what anybody stands for, because what we are doing is designed to allow us to be all things to all people.

What you have done here by offering this amendment is outright hypocrisy and frankly, as I said, I am encouraging all our Members to vote with all the rest of you who seek to carry out this kind of charade. I think it is totally nonsensical.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MICHEL) has consumed 5 minutes.

The gentleman from Colorado (Mr. WIRTH) is recognized.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman yield 1 minute to me?

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the chairman of the Budget Committee, the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. JONES).

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I think what my good friend, the distinguished minority leader, said is that, "This won't play in Peoria."

The point is that for 2 years we have been criticized for not allowing this budget to be considered. At one point we were even criticized by a member of the administration, telling us how much money they spent developing the budget.

Now if we are not going to be criticized again, I do not have any particular interest in voting on this thing.

But the point is out of this whole process of trying to arrive at some sound budget solutions, the Republican Party asked for two substitutes, themselves. I think members of your own party—I have not yielded yet—other members in our party have asked for additional substitutes that show the different gradations of people's thinking about the best way to reduce the deficits.

My preference, and I think the budget that we can enforce best, is the committee budget. It can send positive signals to the financial markets that we are going to seriously reduce the deficits. I think it adopts some concepts—a modified freeze and pay-as-you-go—that are important to sound budgeting.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma, Mr. Jones has expired.

The Chairman recognizes the gentleman from Colorado (Mr. WIRTH).

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Chairman, I would yield 4 minutes—

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, I thought the Chair had yielded 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, as I recall, and I never yielded back the floor.

I yielded to the gentleman for a question, I thought, either a question or an observation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado (Mr. WIRTH) yielded to the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. JONES). The Chair recognized the gentleman from Colorado (Mr. WIRTH) who then in turn yielded.

Mr. MICHEL. May I then reclaim my time, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Chairman, may I extend my apologies to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MICHEL). I thought we were rotating the time back and forth.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has 25 minutes remaining. If he would like to take some of his time at the present time, the Chair has no objection.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. DANNEMEYER).

Mr. DANNEMEYER. I thank my leader for making the comments that he did with respect to the charade through which we are going on the budget process. It would have been much better to have one on each side with perfecting amendments and I support that.

But fortunately for the people of the country, the Members of this institution to the contrary notwithstanding, our forefathers designed a mechanism in the Constitution that is going to bring the House of Representatives the discipline of matching the outgo with the income sooner than any of us, I think, are willing to accept.

And that is a mechanism whereby if we do not act responsibly in balancing our budget, which we have not done technically over the last 6 or 7 years, our Founding Fathers put a provision in our Constitution which permits the States of the Union to compel the Congress to propose an amendment to the States calling for a balanced budget, or in the alternative of calling a convention for that purpose.

Now it so happens that 32 States in the Union have petitioned the Congress to do that. When the number gets to 34, the Constitution of our country says we are required to call that convention on the subject of a balanced budget amendment.

I want to remind my colleagues that California has qualified an initiative for the November ballot of this year, where we in California will vote on whether or not we want to make our State the 33d State. And there is an initiative effort underway in the State of Montana which will also be on the ballot in November of this year which would make Montana the 34th State.

Now, when the number gets to 34 we, in this institution will be required to propose an amendment to the States.

Does my colleague from California desire recognition?

Ms. FIEDLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DANNEMEYER. I am happy to yield to my colleague from California.

Ms. FIEDLER. I appreciate the gentleman raising that issue, because I think it is instructive for the Members of the House of Representatives to consider what has happened in the State of California. They often think we are rather progressive, and some times people think we are radical. But in fact we had a State legislature in the State of California that was as unresponsive to the citizens of the State as a whole as often this House of Representatives and the Senate is.

And what happened in that State is that the people took much of the authority away from those people who stood in elective office and instead developed a system through the initiative process in order to make their wishes known and it seems to me that as you comment on the necessity of a balanced budget amendment that the only reason we face a possibility of that balanced budget amendment passing in enough States to actually require us to have a vote is because the House and the Senate have not been sufficiently responsive to the needs of the American people and instead of having been responsible, have been irresponsible.

So it is a lesson that we have to remember, that we do continue to have the authority resting in the hands of the people of this United States and that in the event we do not respond in an appropriate way they are going to take it from us and we are going to lose the opportunity to make the decisions unless we do it right.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. I thank my colleague for that comment.

I will sum up by making this observation. We do not have to wait until the hammer of the 34th State hits us over the head and puts us into the constitutional crisis of the Congress being required to call a convention.

Now, I have clearance from the leadership of the minority to ask this unanimous-consent request this evening.

And it is essentially this: I ask unanimous consent that I have cleared with the minority to bring up for consideration on the floor of this House a proposed constitutional amendment now pending in the Judiciary Committee, where it has been buried.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will advise the gentleman that his unanimous-consent request is not in order in the Committee of the Whole.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Chairman, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Is it not correct to say that under the rules of the House by unanimous consent any request is in order at any time?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will advise the gentleman that asking consideration in the House is not in order in the Committee.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Is not a unanimous-consent request on any subject available to a Member when we are in the Committee of the Whole?

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of the Whole does not control House procedures.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. So I cannot be recognized at this point for making a unanimous-consent request to bring onto the floor of the House for a vote a proposed constitutional amendment; is that the ruling?

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of the Whole does not have the power to grant that request.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. I thank the Chair for the ruling.

Mr. Chairman, let me conclude by making this observation.

I would hope that partisanship aside that we can respond to the wishes of a huge majority of the American people, 65 to 70 percent, in poll after poll, who want this institution to balance the budget by cutting spending, not raising taxes.

I would hope that in this second year of the 98th Congress we can bring the issue to a vote so that those of us who support it can tell that to our constituents and those of us who oppose it can also say the same thing to our constituents. Let the people decide who they want to return for the 99th Congress.

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 9 minutes to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. WRIGHT), the majority leader.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to speak on this amendment. I do agree with my distinguished friend, the minority leader, that all of us should join together and vote against this amendment. I do not think anybody in the House really wants to pass this amendment which would ratify the President's budget without change, without the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i," just exactly the way the President sent it. That would be a derogation of the congressional responsibility.

What puzzles me, however, is that my distinguished friend, the minority leader, seemed so disturbed and so upset and so unhappy that the amendment had been offered.

While I think it would be outrageous and ridiculous in the extreme for the Congress to adopt the amendment, since the President himself subsequently has abandoned this position, nevertheless I think there was a reason that it should have been offered. I think the gentleman from Illinois will agree with me when he recalls that twice the President has publicly criticized the Congress for not voting on his budget the way he sent it up here.

In 1982, on May 8, President Reagan said that his fiscal year 1983 budget proposal, and I am quoting his words, "which the Congress refused to act on * * *" as though we had done him a grave injustice by not acting on his budget just the way he sent it up here, would, by his representation, have drastically reduced the deficits.

Well, I think most of us recognize that it would not have reduced the deficits, but he complained publicly that the Congress did not vote on his budget the way he had sent it up, just verbatim.

Then again last year he did exactly the same thing. In a press conference on May 27 of last year, the President said, and I am quoting from his remarks at the press conference.

The President said:

> The budget proposal that we submitted to the Congress and which in both Houses they refused to consider actually would have put us on a declining deficit.

Now those are the words of President Reagan. He complained that in both Houses we refused to consider his budget.

Now, the gentleman from Illinois will recall that last year we adopted a rule which allowed to the minority side the privilege of offering any kind of an amendment, any kind of a substitute that it saw fit to offer to the budget resolution as it had been proposed by the House Committee on the Budget.

The minority party, at that time, chose, of its own volition, not to offer any amendment. They forewent the privilege of offering a substitute and by so doing obviously they declined to offer the budget that the President had himself written and sent to the Congress. That was their privilege. I do not blame them. I think they were more responsible in offering nothing then in offering that.

And, of course, this year I agree with the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MICHEL) that we should reject this amendment. It would be silly for the Congress now at this point, after all the work that we have put into the budget, after all the arduous labors that we have devoted to reducing the enormous deficits that were projected by the President's budget, then to cave in and cravenly adopt, without any change, the budget submitted by the President.

Mr. DAUB. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WRIGHT. Of course, I will yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. DAUB. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I just want to take this time to thank the majority leader for defending the virtue of the House.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am grateful for the gentleman's comment. I am not sure that the virtue of the House needs defending, but to the extent that it may I shall attempt always to rise to its defense against any cowing or craven creature who seeks to besmirch the virtue of this institution of ours. I hope others will join me in so doing.

But let me just say this. The President has played fast and loose with the Congress on so many occasions. By loose rhetoric he has condemned us, for example, blaming us for dragging our feet on not having passed a crime bill in the House a couple of days after the Senate had passed it.

The truth was that in the earlier session of the Congress we had passed just such an omnibus crime package and he, the President, had vetoed it.

On these two occasions he sought to gain political advantage by criticizing the Congress for not having considered his budget. That is why it was offered today, so that the Congress could consider the President's budget and could, as the gentleman from Illinois recommends that we do, vote it down, perhaps nearly unanimously. Surely overwhelmingly. And the President no longer will feel that he has been denied or betrayed the opportunity to have a vote on his budget. That is why it was offered.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WRIGHT. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Would the gentleman admit that perhaps we have played a little fast and loose with the budget procedures around here, too, down through the years.

Why I remember the gentleman from Texas coming to the well when we were developing the fiscal 1981 budget and telling us how we had a balanced budget and he was so proud of that. He talked at great length about that balanced budget. And it turned out he made a little $58 billion error.

Can the gentleman tell us whether or not that might be playing just a little bit fast and loose with the budget process?

Mr. WRIGHT. I would be glad to respond to the gentleman's question.

I was mistaken in 1980 or whenever it was that I made reference to a budget resolution as representing a balance. It did not represent a balance.

What happened, of course, was a combination of things. We fell into a state of high unemployment. Every time you have more people unemployed, you have fewer people paying taxes and you have more people drawing unemployment compensation. That contributed to, in a very large extent, the imbalance.

From May 1981 until May 1982, approximately 2 million additional Americans became unemployed, perhaps as many as 3 million additional Americans became unemployed. And that fact alone probably added some $60 billion to the deficit, if not more.

So the best laid plans can go astray. I am inclined to say, however, that we in the Congress have tried, in spite of those difficulties, to balance the budget.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WRIGHT. Not at this point. The gentleman realizes I have only 2 more minutes. I prefer not to ask for additional time. I responded to the gentleman's questions.

Let us put the responsibility for the imbalance right where it belongs. Ronald Reagan is the cause of the budget deficits being as large as they are.

When Ronald Reagan came into office, he did so blaming the $30 billion deficits that had occurred under his predecessor Jimmy Carter. He promised to balance the budget by 1983 if not sooner.

Well, the 1983 deficit, as we all know, far from being balanced, is the largest deficit in our history. It is three times larger than the largest deficit ever suffered under any previous administration in the history of this Nation.

How large are these Reagan deficits, resulting, according to Dr. Feldstein, from three things, from the enormously excessive tax cut of 1981, from the extreme increase in military spending that accompanied it, and from the increase in interest rates that we are paying, how large are they? They are this large: that in 4 years of Reagan administration policies, we are going to add more to the national debt than we added in all 35 years subsequent to World War II under seven Presidential administrations, Democratic and Republican, in toto.

In 1 more year, if you stretch these policies out over 1 more year and have no dramatic change in them, we will have added more to the national debt in 5 years of the policies of Ronald Reagan, the policies of big tax cuts for the wealthiest and unprecedented increases in military spending at the same time, than were added to the national debt in 192 years of constitutional government, inclusive.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas (Mr. WRIGHT) has expired.

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. WRIGHT. Beginning with the administration of George Washington through that of Jimmy Carter, 39 American Presidential administrations it required to reach $1 trillion national debt. And the policies of the Ronald Reagan administration, because we did to a very substantial degree follow them in 1981, will add an additional trillion, bringing the national debt to $2 trillion in 5 short years.

Mr. WALKER. Since the gentleman got additional time, will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. WRIGHT. No; I do not yield at this time. My time is about up, and I have only one thing I would like to say in closing, and that is: That is why I joined my distinguished friend, the minority leader, Mr. MICHEL, in recommending that all of us reject this amendment.

Surely the House and the Senate can do better than simply to accept and endorse and embrace, without change, the budget sent up by the President. But surely we owe him, since he has objected so vigorously in the past 2 years to our not doing so, the courtesy of giving him a vote on his budget.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL).

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I have only asked for a minute to speak on this particular amendment because it does not even deserve that much time.

I think it is an unworthy thing to bring an obsolete budget to this floor when the President has already stated his preference for a new budget plan. In fact he had a little party in the Rose Garden, and described very carefully what kind of a budget he wants.

If you want to vote for the President's budget, you vote for the Latta substitute.

If you want to vote for frivolity, vote for this amendment, or maybe we should dredge up the budget of a few years ago of the gentleman from Colorado and include the extra tax money that he and his friends tried to put in a few years ago.

This amendment is not doing our procedures any good. The House deserves better than the introduction of an amendment that is no longer relevant in the hope it will be defeated and thereby embarrass someone. We will all certainly vote against the amendment and the House to return to serious business.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Florida (Mr. MACK).

Mr. MACK. Well, maybe we ought to just title what we are seeing here this afternoon as "Little men must have fun. Little men must have fun."

You know, just a few minutes ago, the gentleman from Washington (Mr. LOWRY) was down here talking about, the sham that is being pulled on the American people today. Every one of the budget resolutions that have been put together outlining their ability to reduce the deficit is from a different baseline from which we had started. And what the gentleman is saying is that we have moved the baseline up so that we can show bigger deficit reductions. But he and I both know, from the discussions we heard in the Budget Committee, that these budget resolutions are not going to impact what is going on in the country. It is not going to lower interest rates, it is not going to put more people back to work, it is not going to determine a higher level of economic growth for a longer period of time. The whole process is a sham.

I think the gentleman from Colorado has gone one step further in making a mockery out of this budget process in bringing the amendment to the floor that he does. In addition to that, I ask you: Where were you last year, where were you last year when exactly the same information was given to every member of the Budget Committee, every Member of the House? We talked last year about a $184 billion deficit that went on to $200 billion in the following years. But what did the Democrats put together last year? You put together a budget resolution that you knew would not work. You knew going in that the $73 billion in taxes that you put in your resolution never would be passed. It was only put in there so that you could bring forth more and more spending programs.

As far as I am concerned, what you are doing here today is just telling the American people that it is one more little game that little boys must play.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire how much time is remaining on each side?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MICHEL) has 17 minutes remaining; the gentleman from Colorado (Mr. WIRTH) has 16 minutes remaining.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. GINGRICH).

Mr. GINGRICH. I thank our leader for yielding this time, and I want to pick up on the eloquent comments in defending the virtues of the House by the majority leader, the gentleman from Texas.

The Democratic leadership obviously thinks that this amendment is a shrewd gimmick, a nice cheap shot at Reagan and Republicans.

In fact, I think you are reeducating and reminding the American people as to why they distrust the House.

I just finished reading today a study by a leading pollster who asked the American people: "Who is to blame for deficits?" And I think it is probably bad news for the Democrats. Twenty-four percent of the American people blame President Reagan for deficits; 60 percent of the American people blame the Congress for deficits; and, as they watch this joke this afternoon, this cheap charade, I think that they are being reminded of why they blame the Congress.

Furthermore, even after all of the speeches by Messrs, Mondale, HART, and Jackson on the deficit, only 32 percent of the country thinks that a Democratic Presidential candidate could have any impact, 44 percent think President Reagan is more likely to cut the deficit.

Today's behavior is a practical joke by the Democratic leadership. It would have been more appropriate on April Fools Day.

The Republican leader, Mr. MICHEL, made an excellent proposal. Ideally, we should have a bipartisan effort; ideally, we should try to solve the deficit crisis, to bring spending under control.

Even if the liberal Democratic leadership cannot be bipartisan in an election year, we should offer a system for two budget choices, one Democrat, one Republican, each with perfecting amendments.

Instead of a serious process for the House to deal with the serious issue of the budget and the deficit, the Democratic leadership has created a chaotic charade of six Democratic options, with one of those options a partisan trick that demeans and weakens the House. If the liberal Democrats want to offer the current budget of President Reagan, they could join with Mr. LATTA of Ohio. The Latta budget represents the legitimate current effort by the Reagan administration to work with its allies in the House. The Latta budget is a legitimate, serious effort to present President Reagan's position.

But let me go a stage further. The eloquent and distinguished Mr. WIRTH of Colorado I am sure recognizes that his State has a favorite son candidate for President. Why does not the gentleman offer, why did not the gentleman offer the Hart budget? Your Speaker has a candidate for President, Mr. Mondale. Why did he not offer a budget? I was correctly pointing out earlier it is a three-man race. Certainly Mr. Jackson has a budget worth mentioning. If your side is interested in offering a Presidential budget, why did not either you or the distinguished committee chairman offer a budget from a candidate you think is capable of governing?

And I would be glad to yield for your answer.

Mr. WIRTH. When I last looked, the gentleman from Colorado, Mr. HART, is a member of the Senate Budget Committee, is perfectly capable of offering his own budget as a member of the U.S. Senate, and also perfectly capable of speaking for himself on this front, and I would not presume to do so.

Mr. GINGRICH. If I may reclaim my time, surely you recognize that Mr. HART has been busy in New York, with not too much success, but busy, that he is being busy now in Pennsylvania. And I simply suggest to you, in all seriousness, if your side had the guts to try to govern, you would have brought a budget from your Presidential candidate to the floor of this House and let your side try to vote for a $300 billion tax increase over the next 5 years. I do not care which of the three gentleman's budget you would like to offer, their budgets are big tax increase budgets.

Let me yield briefly to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and then I will come back, if I might.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I just want to emphasize his point and also call into question the point made by the majority leader a few moments ago.

This House over the last 5 years has succeeded in adding $274 billion to Presidential budget requests. So, in fact, it is not the Presidents that are adding to the deficits, it is us and our spending that are adding to the deficits; we are the culprits. If the pollsters are finding that the American people understand that, the American people understand truth.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Colorado (Mr. WIRTH).

Mr. WIRTH. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The gentleman had pointed out how busy the candidates have been in New York and elsewhere. Our Senator from Colorado has also been very busy in the State of Georgia, in which he did very well, as the gentleman probably knows.

Mr. GINGRICH. We were delighted to have him come visit.

Mr. WIRTH. I would also point out that I believe that there is only one President of the United States currently in the White House; the President does have the obligation to provide a budget.

Mr. GINGRICH. But the President does have a budget that is being offered.

Mr. WIRTH. But the President does have the right to have that budget considered and acted on.

Mr. GINGRICH. Let me make this point again.

The President has a budget that is being offered in a serious way. The minority leader and the Republicans in this House have worked on that budget. But let me go one step further, if I might.

The majority leader came down here and talked about loose talk. Let me just say if the majority leader and the Speaker wanted to bring up a constitutional amendment to require a balanced budget, they could bring it up tomorrow. In fact, they could bring it up this evening, given the way they have run the Rules Committee recently.

I am sure that they could convene it and bring it to the floor tonight. The fact is that they want the issue, they want to talk about it, and they are totally unwilling to control spending.

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Montana (Mr. WILLIAMS).

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. Mr. Chairman, my colleagues, I rise in opposition to the budget which has been submitted by our President, Ronald Reagan. There have been several interesting things said on the floor here today with regard to this amendment; many of them expressed by our Republican colleagues.

One, the minority leader, said that this process is absolutely a fraud and a bust. The second interesting thing that was said by a Republican, was that the President's budget is an obsolete document. The last speaker called this consideration nothing but a cheap shot.

I am not sure that any of those three charges are true, but if they are, I really think that the fault lies not with the Congress, but with the President, who, without exception, has consistently used the budget, not as an economic document, but as a philosophical and political mechanism.

Throughout history, whenever any President has submitted a budget to this House, that budget has defined that President and that administration's intent. It has defined their preference for America's economy.

No document, no document so clearly defines the President's view of America's tomorrow as does his budget. What is this President's view of tomorrow defined by this budget? This President with this budget would cut 20,000 young people from Head Start in America. This President would significantly increase school lunch and school breakfast costs for the near poor. This President would significantly decrease support for handicapped Americans. Vocational education and the women's educational equity program, would be cut. This budget is unfair, and I join both the Republicans and the Democrats in asking this House to reject this budget.

What is Ronald Reagan's vision of tomorrow? According to his budget, he wants to eliminate the juvenile justice and delinquency prevention program. He wants to reduce significantly funds for runaway youth and homeless youth; he requests reducing it by 54 percent. He wants to make deep reductions in the women, infant, and children feeding program in America. It would terminate feeding programs for between one-half and 1 million low-income, pregnant women and their infants.

The President's budget is unfair and it is a wrongheaded view of America. This budget reflects this President's view of tomorrow by reducing by 80 percent the funds for child abuse and other human service and demonstration programs. It significantly reduces Federal assistance to needy college-age students.

This budget is unfair because this President's view of America is unfair, and that is why both Republicans and Democrats will overwhelmingly reject this budget tonight.

Unfair? This President's budget calls for an increase in defense spending which the overwhelming majority of Republicans and Democrats in both the House and Senate reject. The President is asking the American people to spend $685,000 a minute for every minute of every day of every week of every month of every year for the next 5 years; $685,000 a minute and practically not a Member of the 535 Members of the House and Senate want to spend that much money on defense while we are so drastically cutting the money that we need here at home to get America moving again.

I join the Republicans and the Democrats in solidly, absolutely, and for the final time, my friends, rejecting this President's unfair view of America's tomorrow.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. LOEFFLER).

Mr. LOEFFLER. I thank my distinguished minority leader for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, I have got to ask the question: Why should anyone support the pending amendment? Quite frankly, the form that this amendment has been submitted to us on the floor is not one that is serious. If those of you on the majority side were serious in putting together this amendment, you would have included reconciliation procedures to enforce the savings assumed in the budget resolution.

The gentleman who just preceded me in the well from the State of Montana enjoyed exploiting the issue but would never place the budget in question in any real jeopardy of being implemented. So, it remains for this gentleman to ask the question: What is the matter, were you afraid that if this had been considered in a serious manner, with full enforcement procedures, that it might have passed?

Compare what the President has done with respect to the deficit reduction activities this year, with this frivolous exercise by the majority party.

The President has been serious. On January 25, he came to this floor. During his State of the Union address to the Nation, he said, and I quote:

> We must bring down the deficit to insure continued economic growth. In the budget that I will submit on February 1, I will recommend measures that will reduce the deficit over the next 5 years. Many of these will be unfinished business from last year's budget. Some could be enacted quickly if we could join in a serious effort to address this problem.
> I spoke today with Speaker O'NEILL, Senate Majority Leader BAKER, Senate Minority Leader BYRD, and House Minority Leader MICHEL. I asked them if they would designate congressional representatives to meet with representatives of the administration to try to reach prompt agreement on a bipartisan deficit downpayment plan.
> I know it will take a long, hard struggle to agree on a full-scale plan. So, what I have proposed is that we first see if we can agree on a downpayment.
> Now, I believe there is basis for such an agreement. One that could reduce the deficits by $100 billion over the next 3 years. If the congressional leadership is willing, my representatives will be prepared to meet with theirs at the earliest possible time. I would hope the leadership might agree on an expeditious timetable in which to develop and enact that down payment.

Now, what has happened since January 25? Representatives of the administration and Representatives from my party were serious in their efforts to negotiate. The majority party here in this Chamber was not serious, and therefore, we did not make a $100 billion deficit down payment in a bipartisan manner.

So, the President came forward again, and he announced that if the majority party in the House is not willing to negotiate in a serious way, then he would work with the Senate leadership and with the Republican minority in the House and come up with a $150 billion deficit reduction.

That is being serious. Again, to the majority: When you offer an amendment, be serious in your intentions or be straight forward about the charade you are engaged in.

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. AUCOIN).

Mr. AUCOIN. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, we have been hearing a lot of crowing about Presidential leadership over the last 3 years. I would remind my colleagues that one of the powers of a Presidential leader is his power to present a budget laying out the direction he proposes for this country.

The Constitution gives that power to the President. It does not give it to the President and Mr. LATTA; it gives it to the President of the United States.

The President's budget, any President's budget, is the major fiscal document of any session of Congress. It is the point of reference. This budget happens to be $192 billion out of balance.

I am astonished that some Republicans are now asking why it is that we, in the House, should vote on the President's budget. Well, I remember the ringing words of the President when he addressed the joint session of the Congress and ushered in his revolution which gives us these staggering budget deficits.

I would answer the Republican minority leader's question when he says, why should we vote on the President's budget, by repeating the words of the President at that time. The President said: "If not we, who? If not now, when?"

Mr. HEFNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUCOIN. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. HEFNER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Someone correct me, certainly if I am wrong. You did not need a constitutional amendment. In the substitute, under the rule, you could have offered a balanced budget here today or tomorrow. The proposal of the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATTA) could have the offer of a balanced budget tomorrow. Is that right?

Mr. AUCOIN. I would say to the gentleman that is right.

Mr. HEFNER. If the gentleman will yield further, so in essence there could have been a balanced budget offered.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUCOIN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LATTA. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Under the rule granted, we had to have our budgets costed out beforehand and we had a deadline of the day before, I think, at noon on Monday.

Mr. HEFNER. If the gentleman will yield further, in the Budget Committee the gentleman could have offered a balanced budget.

Mr. LATTA. Yes; and so could the gentleman himself.

Mr. HEFNER. I am not the one who was calling for it.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUCOIN. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Since the gentleman has mentioned the Budget Committee, I will remind my colleagues that two times in the last month, in writing, I asked the distinguished chairman of the Budget Committee, the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. JONES), for the privilege of coming to the Budget Committee to make a presentation of the budget alternative that I am pleased to present to the House and he told me they did not have time for the Budget Committee to even consider it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. AUCOIN) has expired.

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Chairman, how much time do I have remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado (Mr. WIRTH) has 7 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MICHEL) has 8 minutes remaining. The gentleman from Illinois, in this case, has the right to finish debate.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. LOTT).

Mr. LOTT. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I would first like to ask a question. I would like to ask the gentleman from Oregon where it is in the Constitution that says the President of the United States submits a budget to the Congress?

I will answer the question. It is not in the Constitution. It is in the Budget Act of 1921. It is not in the Constitution, though.

As far as who is playing fast and loose around here, I submit that the Congress is the guilty party. The Congress has for years rejected Presidents' budgets, as my colleagues on the other side of the aisle rejected President Carter's budgets, and year after year spent more than he requested.

In fiscal year 1980, for instance, he requested $531.6 billion. The Congress went over that by $47.6 billion. In fiscal year 1981, he requested $651 billion and Congress went over it by $45 billion.

Mr. AUCOIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOTT. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. AuCOIN. I appreciate the gentleman yielding.

Mr. Chairman, since the 1920's, virtually every President who has ever held that office has had the authority and the power to present a budget to the Congress, has done so, and has stood by that budget, and has not thrown it out like a wet sweat sock like this President and blamed his predecessors for his errors.

Mr. LOTT. If I might remind the gentleman, many Presidents, including your own President Carter in 1981, have revised their budgets. Presidents, just as President Reagan, have tried to work with the Congress in a bipartisan way to come up with budgets for the good of the country, but the problem is the Congress, because for the past 40 years the Congress has been throwing all their budgets out the window and going right on with their profligate spending and raising taxes year after year.

There was a gratuitous crack made a while ago that I want to respond to also.

I submit that this procedure here will not play too well in Tulsa, either. For the American people need to understand what is going on here.

First of all, the gentleman who offered this amendment does not support this amendment.

Mr. Chairman, earlier I asked the Chair to make this determination on a parliamentary inquiry, because recognition is a matter within the discretion of the Chair, the Chair has it within his power to deny recognition for frivolous or dilatory purposes, and the rules and precedents of this House indicate that the offerer of an amendment must be a proponent of the amendment. Moreover, House Resolution 476, the rule which makes the Jones amendment in order, provides that half the debate time be allocated to a Member offering the amendment and half be assigned to "a Member opposed thereto." It is thus the clear intent of the rule that the offerer of the amendment be a proponent of the amendment, one who favors it, so that debate time is equally divided between proponents and opponents as is also the requirement under clause 5 of House rule 23.

Mr. Chairman, I would cite Jefferson's Manual, at section 26, in which Jefferson states that it is "a constant rule" of parliamentary law "that no man is to be employed in any matter who has declared himself against it." Jefferson goes on to cite from British Precedents, as follows: "The child is not to be put to the nurse that cares not for it." I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that if someone is recognized to offer an amendment which he opposes, we are establishing a very dangerous and bad precedent for this House—one which flies in the faces of centuries of parliamentary law in this body and our Mother Parliament.

Second, it was not requested by the minority, which is the traditional way of handling an amendment like this. It was proposed originally by the President but subsequently altered by agreement.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. LOTT) has expired.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. LOTT. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this additional time.

Mr. Chairman, I have supported the budget process. A lot of our colleagues around here have not, but I voted for the Budget Impoundment Act and I have tried to support it. But after what we have gone through in recent years, including what we went through last year with an unrealistic budget proposal, with tax increases we knew were not going to happen, and now with this kind of childish prank, I do not know if the budget process is worth pursuing any further, if all we are going to do is to use this frivolous and dilatory process to make a political mockery of a thing that should be very seriously approached.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I submit that the people of Oklahoma, and the people of America, want a serious deficit reduction package.

Mr. LOTT. I think they do, too, and I do not think they would approve of this frivolous kind of amendment.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. If the gentleman will let me finish, I said in the very beginning that we ought to have two tests to measure these substitutes: Is it a serious, honest budget that reduces the deficit, and will it be enforced?

Mr. LOTT. Is this a serious, honest effort that is being made by the gentleman from Colorado, as proposed by the gentleman from Oklahoma? It is not a serious and honest proposal or process.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. I submit to you that the one that is serious and can be enforced is the committee budget, and that is the one we ought to pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado (Mr. WIRTH) has 7 minutes remaining.

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. LEVITAS).

Mr. LEVITAS. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I was listening to the majority leader's statement, and there is one point that has not yet been answered by people who say that this amendment proposing President Reagan's budget is not a serious effort. Was the majority leader correct in saying that the President of the United States complained last year that we did not even take a vote on his budget? Is that a true statement or is it not a true statement? If it is a true statement, then I think we ought to remove the basis for the President's complaint this year. If the President wanted to have a vote on his budget and makes a point if he does not get a vote, then we owe it to him to give him a vote on his budget.

Was that a true statement or was it not? Did the President complain that we did not even vote on his budget last year, or did he not? I am patiently waiting for an answer from the other side of the aisle.

Mr. WIRTH. If the gentleman would yield, the dates on which the President complained that we had not acted on his budget were May 8, 1982, and again the next year, on May 27, 1983; both of these were noted by the gentleman from Colorado and by the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. LEVITAS. I thank the gentleman from Colorado for clarifying that.

If for no other reason, I do not want to give the President cause for complaint again, and I think we ought to vote on this.

President Reagan sent Congress his budget in January. It was in a blue book and it had his name signed on it. The last two times he did that and Congress did not vote on the budget he sent, President Reagan said that it was not right that Congress—including the Republican-controlled Senate—did not even have the decency to vote on it. We can remedy that problem tonight.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado (Mr. WIRTH) has 6 minutes remaining.

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. WEAVER).

Mr. WEAVER. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I want very much the opportunity to vote against the President's budget, and here is why: Here is the President's budget. This large figure right here is military and military foreign aid. The next large item is interest on the national debt. Here this small one is all social programs combined, even including unemployment compensation.

If we knocked all the social programs out, it would reduce the deficit by about a third. The truth is, the military spending constitutes the majority of the Reagan budget. If the deficit is to be brought under control, the military spending must be cut.

There is no other item large enough; it is the deficit cause.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado (Mr. WIRTH) has 5 minutes remaining.

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time. I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Two technical points have been made. Previous speakers on the Republican side referred to the fact that the President had changed his budget, and that he now supports the so-called Rose Garden budget. This is not being offered, however, by the minority. The Rose Garden budget is not going to be considered here. We could have voted on that as well. My guess is that we would have had the same negative vote from the minority on that front.

Mr. LOEFFLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIRTH. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. LOEFFLER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is just not correct. Yes, we are with the President on the Rose Garden budget. It is part of the Latta substitute which we will be considering later, and we have added several items to it. Yes, we are considering it.

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will allow me to reclaim my time, the Latta package is not the Rose Garden budget. It has some elements of that in it, but a great number of other things that are not included in the Rose Garden budget.

Mr. LOEFFLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIRTH. Let me finish my statement.

Mr. Chairman, another point which I think, for the accuracy of the RECORD, ought to be pointed out is that, first, the minor has supported that the Democratic plan which we will be voting on later is an enormous tax plan, as opposed to the Latta plan.

The facts of the matter are that in fiscal year 1985 the Latta plan, as estimated by CBO, provides revenues of $742 billion. The Democratic plan also provides revenues of $742 billion. So the revenues in both the Latta plan and the Democratic plan are the same.

I might just close with a word to the distinguished minority leader. The gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MICHEL) had suggested that the purpose of offering the President's budget was to somehow embarrass the President or the minority. I have no intention, I say to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MICHEL) in any way, shape, or form of embarrassing anybody. I might disagree with the President, I might disagree with the minority, but I do not intend to embarrass anybody.

I do, however, wish to prevent the President from seeking to embarrass the Congress by accusing us of not considering his budget. That is the intent, not to embarrass anybody, but to make sure that the President does not come back at us, as he has in the past, and accuse us of not considering his budget.

Mr. Chairman, I will be asking for a recorded vote so we can consider the President's budget. We have considered it now, and then we can act upon it with our votes, yes or no.

Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MICHEL) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I took the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. JONES) at his word as I listened to his opening remarks during the debate on all these budget resolutions in which he said we ought to approach it in a twofold way from point of serious and responsible deficit reduction. That is what rankled me no end when I found to my displeasure that there would be, rather, an amendment offered in a frivolous way for the consideration of all Members that quite obviously would not have a chance of passage in this body.

As has been alluded to several times now, there has been no President in recent years whose raw budget has been the topic for discussion out here on the floor. It has always been a reworked, refined budget since enactment of the Budget Act. So there is nothing altogether unique about that.

So far as the President criticizing the Congress from time to time for not acting on his budget is concerned, I think if we go back, we will also recall that references were made to the fact that as we came near the end of the year, we were not reconciling and were not doing what we were really supposed to be doing to make the Budget Act really work for the American people; we would then act through continuing resolutions and all the rest, never finishing up our business at the end of the year.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. MICHEL. Yes; I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I want to underscore what I said in the opening statement and what the gentleman says now. On every one of these substitutes, I hope we know that if we vote for them, we are going to have to come back later and vote for the individual bills that will enforce them. I do not want to have another repeat of last year or any other year in which we have said one thing on the budget and done something else on the appropriation bills. That is something that both Democrats and Republicans have been guilty of doing.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, I certainly hope that would be the case because otherwise it is exactly what I labeled it earlier, a sham. The only way the Budget Act really works is if there is eventually a reconciliation of what we set out as target goals for us at the beginning of the year, and then we should come to the end of the session and reconcile in dollars and cents, either on the expenditure side or the tax side. And when the President presented his initial budget, he made these comments that the gentleman from Texas repeated in his State of the Union message:

"If you don't like it, let us rework it on a bipartisan basis."

That effort apparently fell apart.

Those of us who are Republicans on our side, with the other body being controlled by Members of our party, thought we would do the best we could to improve upon the President's submission. There is no question but what there were Members here who wanted to cut it deeper on the defense figure, and we had to get the President to move off his firm position there because we all know how strongly he feels about rebuilding the country's defenses. We know the President's view on raising taxes. He wants to be known as the President who lowered taxes, not raised them.

So that was another component that had to be considered. But I thought all told, when we put it together, we had a package that really was realistic and responsible and offered a sharp deficit reduction. That is what we come to this floor with through the Latta amendment.

Yes; there are some other proposals. I note that some do not want to raise taxes whatsoever, and some do not want any cuts whatsoever in defense.

I still would come back to my original premise that in the future hopefully we would have a presentation by the majority and one opportunity by the minority and then have perfecting amendments to both base bills. Only in that way do we eventually get a refined product at the end of the debate on which we can make a clean, clear-cut choice. That is the responsible way in my judgment of legislating a budget around here.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman suggests, I think we all on both sides of the aisle want to watch very carefully and monitor very carefully those individual votes on appropriation bills that in the final analysis really give testimony to where one really feels seriously on the individual items that come before us.

Mr. Chairman, I will close my case and ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from Colorado (Mr. WIRTH).

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 1, noes 401, not voting 30, as follows:

Messrs. PACKARD, BREAUX, BEDELL, GIBBONS, HUTTO, MARLENEE, and BOUCHER changed their votes from "aye" to "no."

So the amendment in the nature of a substitute was rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, when Ronald Reagan was elected President, he promised to fight waste in Government. Tonight's vote suggests that instead of fighting waste, Mr. Reagan has incorporated it as an integral part of his administration. Instead of an enemy, waste has become his watchword.

In the last 2 years, Mr. Reagan's proposed budgets were so out of touch with the political realities that they never even came to the House floor for a vote. The cost of just printing these two documents is estimated by the Government Printing Office to be in the neighborhood of $1.3 million.

Mr. Chairman, when you add to that figure the costs of thousands of Government workers in countless Government agencies who are called upon to contribute months of their time to developing that budget—and some estimates reach $13 million a year—you have quite a sum.

Tonight, Mr. Chairman, we have extended to the President the courtesy of a vote on his 1985 budget. If nothing else, the time, effort, and money required to produce this enormous work compels us to pass judgment on it.

The Budget Committees of both the House and Senate have wisely rejected this budget.

The minority Members of this House have also rejected it.

Tonight the whole House, by a margin of approximately 400 votes, soundly rejected it.

Even the President's own advisers repudiated it almost as soon as it was submitted.

Unfortunately, Mr. Chairman, the American taxpayer is not in a position to reject the tab for this, Mr. Reagan's latest budgetary folly.

AMENDMENT IN THE NATURE OF A SUBSTITUTE OFFERED BY MR. DANNEMEYER

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will designate the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The text of the amendment in the nature of a substitute is as follows:

Amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by Mr. DANNEMEYER: Strike everything after the resolving clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

AUTOMATIC SECOND BUDGET RESOLUTION

SEC. 3. (a) If Congress has not completed action by October 1, 1984, on the concurrent resolution on the budget required to be reported under section 310(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 for the 1985 fiscal year, then this concurrent resolution shall be deemed to be the concurrent resolution required to be reported under section 310(a) of such Act, for the purposes of the prohibitions contained in section 311 of such Act, notwithstanding congressional action or inaction on any reconciliation requirements contained in this concurrent resolution.

(b) Section 311(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, as made applicable by subsection (a) of this section, shall not apply to bills, resolutions, or amendments within the jurisdiction of a committee, or any conference report on any such bill or resolution, if—

(1) the enactment of such bill or resolution as reported;

(2) the adoption and enactment of such amendment; or

(3) the enactment of such bill or resolution in the form recommended in such conference report;

would not cause the appropriate allocation for such committee of new discretionary budget authority or new spending authority as described in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 made pursuant to section 302(a) of such Act for fiscal year 1985 to be exceeded.

(c) The provisions of this section shall cease to apply when Congress completes action on a subsequent concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1985 pursuant to section 304 or 310 of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974.

SECTION 302(b) FILING REQUIREMENT

SEC. 4. (a) It shall not be in order in the House of Representatives to consider any bill or resolution, or amendment thereto, providing—

(1) new budget authority for fiscal year 1985;

(2) new spending authority described in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act first effective in fiscal year 1985; or

(3) direct loan authority, primary loan guarantee authority, or secondary loan guarantee authority for fiscal year 1985;

within the jurisdiction of any committee which has received an allocation pursuant to section 302(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of discretionary budget authority or new spending authority, as described above, for such fiscal year, unless and until such committee makes the allocation or subdivisions required by section 302(b) of the Congressional Budget Act, in connection with the most recently agreed to concurrent resolution on the budget.

(b) The prohibition contained in subsection (a) shall not apply until twenty-one days of continuous session, as defined in section 1011(5) of the Impoundment Control Act of 1974, after Congress completes action on this concurrent resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to House Resolution 476, the amendment is considered as having been read.

The gentleman from California (Mr. DANNEMEYER) will be recognized for 30 minutes, and a Member opposed will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from California (Mr. DANNEMEYER).

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, we have a serious challenge on our hands. There are two ways you can cut the deficit. You can increase taxes or you can cut spending.

These two charts on my left and your right I think demonstrate that the option of raising taxes is not a viable option for the American people at this time.

The essence of this first chart tracks the taxes on the median family income in America from 1948 through 1983.

This came from the work product of the Grace Commission.

You can see the taxes on the median family income have grown by a factor of 7.6 over the span of 1948 to 1983.

Yet the taxes that this median income family pays has grown by 246 times. Income up 7.6 times, taxes up 246 times.

In order to raise the necessary taxes by raising income taxes to balance the budget, we would have to increase the average rate to 15.9 percent that the median family in America would pay as opposed to what it is today, of 9.2, which would represent a 72-percent increase in taxes that the median income family would have to pay.

Then we have also heard from time to time that, "Well, let's tax the rich in America, because the rich, they are the ones that have the money, and if we tax the rich, we balance the budget."

The second chart I think very eloquently speaks to this. Ninety percent of the income in America is earned by families earning more than $35,000 a year or less. Ninety percent of it.

If we confiscate; not tax, at 50 percent or 70 percent, just confiscate all income of anybody earning more than $35,000 a year, we would run the Government of the United States for 41 days.

Now I suggest to you: Is it a viable option?

The point that I think the second chart tells us is that it is demagoguery for any of us in this business of helping to govern the country to suggest that we are going to balance the budget of this Nation by raising taxes on the rich. That is not where the income is. The income is by people earning $35,000 a year or less. That is where 90 percent of it is.

So on the basis what this data tells us, the only viable option we have before us is cutting spending, not raising taxes.

The President was deeply concerned about this and so he formed a Presidential commission early last year designated the Grace Commission. They organized themselves into 47 task forces. They had 2,000 volunteers from the private sector come together to form their activities; they contributed some $75 million in volunteer time in this process. In cash money they put up $3.4 million and formed a nonprofit corporation to produce their work product.

They produced a total of 2,478 recommendations that totaled a little over $400 billion in spending cuts that could be realized over the next 3 years. And in making these observations, one of them I think is particularly appropriate.

At a point in the work product of the Grace Commission, this statement is made, "Well, if these reductions can be made, why does not the executive branch implement them and that will be achieved?" The stumbling block is that 72 percent of them require congressional action. Twenty-eight percent can be achieved by changes in the executive branch.

The Grace Commission at one point noted there is hardly anything basic in the management of Government operations that does not require congressional approval, be it closing obsolete facilities, buying new computers, the wage scale on Federal construction projects or just about anything that might result in greater efficiencies, including policy decisions in the VA affecting as few as three employees.

They divided their recommendations into five categories: Program waste, 443 recommendations; $160 billion; system failures, 1,152 recommendations, $151 billion; personnel mismanagement, 442 recommendations, $90 billion.

Mr. KEMP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

I apologize for interrupting.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Happy to yield to my colleague, the gentleman from New York (Mr. KEMP).

Mr. KEMP. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I was struck by the gravity of the tax situation illustrated by those charts that the gentleman has presented. And I just wonder, having supported the concept of the Dannemeyer budget, of course we all can find places where we disagree and I know the gentleman recognizes that everybody can support a budget without having to be supportive of every dotted "i" and crossed "t." I would have shaped our security assistance and veterans programs differently but that's always true of budgets.

But I think the gentleman has done yeoman work. I appreciate him so much for what he has done to stimulate debate on the Grace Commission report and tax and monetary reform.

I just wonder what does he envision with regard to taking the concept of tax rate reform and lowering the rates and flattening out the code and simplifying the system so we can broaden the tax base of this country and the revenue to support those programs that are important to this country's future from education, transportation and health to defense.

It is my understanding that the gentleman has included that in his budget.

Could he just amplify that for a moment.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. It is my sincere hope that either as a part of consideration of this budget alternative or some time in the budget process or some time this year, that we in the House can talk about the necessity of what the gentleman from New York (Mr. KEMP) has mentioned of reforming the Tax Code. Most of our constituents, I think, are confused and dismayed by the complexity of it and they want the concept of a flat tax at least debated in this Chamber so we can simplify our Tax Code.

Mr. KEMP. I just remind the gentleman and our colleagues the whole tax rate reduction effort began in a similar time at a similar place right here on the floor of the House during the evening in 1978, during the budget debate when John Rousselot of California, our former colleague from California stood up and offered a budget with spending reductions and an across-the-board reduction in the tax rates of all the American people of 10 percent. That was the beginning of the Reagan and Kemp-Roth tax rate reduction effort.

So you may not win and we all recognize the exigencies of time in this debate. But I want to say to the gentleman he has taken a courageous stand; he is doing the right thing, he is starting a very important debate on behalf of the future of this economy and to those who say that the only way to balance the budget is to raise taxes, the gentleman, I believe, is pointing up the fact of irrefutable evidence that growth and reducing the spending do more to balance the budget and all the tax increases that have yet to be devised by the majority leader and the chairman of the Budget Committee and Mr. HART and Mr. MONDALE and the vast majority of the Democratic leadership.

So hang in there. We are going to have tax reform and growth for the American people because of the efforts that you and others are making here tonight.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. I thank my colleague.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DANNEMEYER. I yield to my colleague from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The gentleman from New York (Mr. KEMP) has just made a point and I think we want to reemphasize it. The gentleman has the only budget on the floor that anticipates using a flat rate tax as a part of dealing with the budget problem; is that not correct?

Mr. DANNEMEYER. One of the premises of this alternative is the consideration of that.

Mr. WALKER. I think also, does not the gentleman anticipate utilizing enterprise zones as a part of the budget presentation that he has before us?

Mr. DANNEMEYER. That is also one of the possibilities of this alternative.

Mr. WALKER. I think I am also correct in saying what the gentleman proposes to do is to phase in a large number of the Grace Commission reforms that would reduce the spending not by eliminating programs or having an adverse impact on the people who receive benefits from programs, but by changing the way the programs are run in a way to make them more efficient and effective; is that not correct?

Mr. DANNEMEYER. For instance, of the Grace recommendations, we pick up 15 percent of them in fiscal 1985, 25 percent in 1986, 30 percent in 1987, and the balance over the next 2 years.

Mr. WALKER. If the gentleman would yield further, I, too, want to congratulate him because he is bringing forth really the only reform budget on the House floor. The American people, it seems to me, are seeking real reform in the budgetary process around here. Most of the budgets that we have before us are simply twiddledee versus twiddle-dum. The gentleman has a real reform budget before us. I congratulate him for the work that he has done.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. I thank my colleague for that comment.

I want to point out because I think it is appropriate at this point to suggest that this budget alternative that is now being presented for consideration by the House is the only one without a tax increase in it.

And in addition, it has the lowest deficit for 1985. I wish I could tell my colleagues that is a balanced budget, but I would be blowing smoke in their faces if I said that. It is not that. But it is the lowest deficit of any of the budget alternatives being considered and it does not have a tax increase in it.

Mr. WALKER. If the gentleman would yield further, if one projects out the gentleman's budget for 5 years, does the gentleman not come fairly close to getting the budget balanced within a 5-year period?

Mr. DANNEMEYER. At the end of 5 years we show a deficit of $93 billion. Now that is on the economic assumption that all of us in this budget process must assume.

Let me observe that if we have just a 1-percent increase in GNP over the next 5 years, and that is not unattainable because today the premise of the Budget Committee is for an average of 3.6 increase in GNP over the next 5 years. Right now in the first quarter of this fiscal year it was 7.2. It is about 6 percent currently. If it is 1 percent higher, we can show a balanced budget at the end of 1989.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. But to give the Members a little more assessment of what this budget alternative would do, it cuts about $200 billion in spending over a 3-year period. In defense it cuts $67.8 billion. In nondefense, $64.1 billion. In non-Grace Commission savings, mostly from recommendations of the Congressional Budget Office, some $53.2 billion. For a total, when added to the market plan, for a total of some $200 billion over a 3-year period.

I think it is also appropriate to point out that when you compare it to the other budgets that each contains a tax increase. In the Jones budget $8.3 billion, in the Roemer budget $11.8 billion, the Dixon budget has $50.6 billion, the McHugh budget is $14.3 billion and the MacKay contains a $9 billion increase.

Mr. KEMP. Mr. Chairman, in deciding the 1985 budget resolution, Congress will choose between the economics of austerity with higher taxes, and the economics of opportunity, growth, and jobs. Some of our colleagues believe, good news is bad news and that austerity is the answer.

This is not an economic philosophy, it is doomsaying. We must endorse the philosophy that economic growth is not harmful, indeed that it is the solution to high deficits, inflation, and unemployment. We have no reason to apologize for this recovery. Our tax cuts and the President's other economic policies have generated 4½ million new jobs, stimulated a capital spending boom twice the pace of any postwar recovery, and created such strong economic growth that budget deficits are declining rapidly—although you would never know it from news reports. The OMB estimates that 1984–88 deficits fell by $185 billion because the 1983 economic growth figures—for a single year—came in stronger than what OMB originally had forecast. And even the current projections have not caught up with the strength of the recovery. According to a group of Wall Street budget experts the 1984 deficit could come in somewhere around $150 billion, rather than the $184 billion figure that OMB projects. Add a $40 to $50 billion surplus at the State and local level and you get a fairer idea about the nature of the problem.

There is no doubt in my mind which budget substitute will help sustain and strengthen this progress toward achieving full employment and strong economic growth without inflation. The Dannemeyer budget embodies a bold pro-growth economic strategy—the sort of Republican platform which our party can put forward against the Democrats' pessimism, hand wringing, and austerity. It is not perfect and I emphatically disagree with some of the cuts and I would have shaped the savings somewhat differently, but it is the concept that deserves support.

First, the Dannemeyer budget emphatically rejects the Democrat's tax increases because they will undermine economic growth and, therefore, will actually generate higher baseline deficits. Many will say that the tax bills only close tax loopholes and will not dampen economic growth or endanger the recovery. These people have not closely examined the ways and means tax increases. The Democrats originally called the tax bill a tax simplification measure. But when it reached to three thick volumes—the last volume alone reaching to 1,000 pages—even the Democrats' could not stomach calling this monstrous bill a tax simplification measure. We should call it for what it is: a tax increase on saving, investment, and enterprise.

Many of the major tax increases now being considered in both the House and Senate are, in fact, not closing loopholes at all. Those who pass a budget resolution that recommends major revenue increases must be prepared to defend, for example, repealing the 15-percent net interest exclusion scheduled to start in 1985. This would take away a major incentive for personal savings and conceivably the drop in savings could match the expected increase in tax revenues. The tax bill also delays the expensing of business personal property for 2 years, thereby penalizing small businesses for their capital investment for 4 more years. We should also understand that the tax bill delays the drop in the top estate and gift tax rate from 60 to 50 percent for 4 years. Compared with current law, this means up to a 20-percent increase on owners of family farms and small businesses who hope to pass on their assets to their children. Do we really want to defend these tax increases and others just as inequitable and economically harmful? The Dannemeyer budget rejects these and other harmful tax increases.

Perhaps most importantly, the Dannemeyer budget resolution provides Republicans the opportunity to go on record, for the first time, in support of a simplified tax system and lower marginal tax rate. The American people are aching for a tax system which wipes away in one stroke most of the loopholes, deductions, and tax shelters which distort the American economy and allow a few taxpayers to get by without paying their fair share of the tax burden. I personally support a broadened tax base that would allow tax rates to fall to at least 30 percent on corporate income and 25 percent on personal income—which along with a broadened tax base would entail no significant loss in tax revenues. Moreover, this reform would not increase the tax burden on any income group of taxpayers.

Can you imagine the upsurge in new business starts, entrepreneurship, and investment if the top personal income tax rate were cut in half? Millions of Americans would fire their expensive tax lawyers and pull out of tax shelters to invest and save in the productive and taxable economy. There is little doubt that the sharply lower tax rates holds the promise eventually to increase tax revenues.

This is no longer an economic theory, but a conclusion based on economic fact. Due to the 1981 Tax Act, the top marginal tax rate was reduced from 70 percent down to 50 percent in one stroke on January 1982. This reduction in marginal tax rates has dramatically increased tax revenues from the upper-income groups, while relieving the tax burden on the middle- and lower-income American. Preliminary IRS tax data for 1982—the first full year of the President's income tax rate reductions—show that income revenues collected from those earning $1 million or more surged 42 percent, while those earning $10,000 or less, for example, actually contributed 13 percent less in tax revenues.

The 1981 tax rate reductions also shifted the tax burden to upper-income groups and lessened the tax burden on average and lower income Americans. In fact, the biggest percentage reduction in tax burden occured for the lowest income taxpayer. Those taxpayers making $50,000 or more, for example, paid 33 percent of total incomes taxes in 1981. But following the 1982 tax rate reduction, that income group paid 35.7 percent of total income taxes. Those making below $15,000, by comparison bore 8.7 percent of the total income tax burden in 1981, but shouldered only 7.9 percent after the Reagan tax cuts. The conclusion: if you want improve economic incentives, bolster the economy, and raise tax revenues from the rich, then lower the marginal tax rates.

Many say that we must accept a tax increase because we cut taxes too much in 1981. First, tax revenues increased—in the midst of the recession—from those higher income groups whose marginal income tax rates were cut in 1982. If anything we should have cut taxes more and sooner so that all income groups shared in the tax rate reduction. Moreover, according to the U.S. Treasury Department, only some $113 billion of the total 1981 tax cuts remain, spread over 9 years, after factoring in offsetting tax increases and bracket creep from inflation. The 1981 tax cut started off large, amounting to $1,488.1 billion over 1981–89. But automatic and legislated tax increases have offset $1,375.2 billion, or 92 percent of the tax cut. The tax burden as a share of GNP clearly shows this reality. Tax revenues are projected at 19.2 percent of GNP in 1985, approximately the same as in 1979, when taxes were 19.7 percent of GNP. The ways and means tax bill increases taxes by $92.3 billion in 1984–89, wiping out nearly all of the remaining Reagan tax cut. This should not happen. The tax cut should be defended and broadened.

I have also frequently heard that we need a tax increase to stem the budget deficit. This charge forgets that the cause of the budget deficit is not insufficient revenues, but the recession. Budget deficits skyrocketed when the bottom fell out of the economy due to a severe cutback of credit by the Federal Reserve Board. According to the OMB, the changes in economic assumptions between the March 1981 budget—which did not anticipate a serious recession—and the January 1984 budget, accounts for 94 percent of the cumulative 1982-86 deficit figures. The current and future budget deficits are largely a residue of the deep recession. Seen in this framework, the best antidote for the current deficit is economic policies to assure the continuation of a strong recovery.

Many counter that the structural deficit will still remain after the economic expansion has reached its potential. But this is only a myth designed to justify tax increases—and the increased Government spending which naturally follows. There is nothing which says that the economy can grow only at some specified rate. The Council of Economic Advisers 1984 report to the President, in fact, sharply revised downward last year's structural deficit for 1983-88 by $431 billion. The 1988 structural deficit alone fell from $306 billion to $187 billion, a 40-percent drop. Half of this decline was due to program changes, but the other half of the deficit reduction resulted from higher-than-anticipated economic growth.

Supporters of tax increases also argue that the Republicans should swallow hard and accept tax hikes as the price to pay for further budget cuts. But those spending cuts are nowhere in sight. We have heard this seductive refrain before with TEFRA. If tax increases are supposed to be part of a deal to cut spending, this time let's see the spending cuts enacted first. No more phony deals on which the Democrats welch, like the supposed $3 for $1 deal which got us TEFRA—but no significant spending cuts. The budget cuts offered in these other budget resolutions are, unfortunately, no more assured than the ones promised by TEFRA.

The Dannemeyer budget promises us real spending cuts. It holds the line on tax increases. And it recommends a comprehensive tax reform proposal that lowers tax rates and simplifies the Tax Code. This is a bold program which vividly displays our differences with the Democrats. It is an economic agenda to bolster the recovery and help bring full employment to America and as an advocate of a gold-based monetary system to help lower interest rates and keep inflation as low as possible.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the Dannemeyer amendment, and I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, let me say first of all that whether it is this substitute, the President's original budget submission, the freeze substitutes, the Roemer substitute, or others, I do not think they should be treated frivolously.

I think the gentleman from California (Mr. DANNEMEYER) has put in a lot of work in developing this budget and I think from his perspective it is the right way to go.

But let me again tell my colleagues that one of the tests of a budget this year ought to be reality. Are we willing to follow up a vote on the budget resolution with the actual votes of reconciliation, appropriations reductions, changes in the Tax Code to implement the budget? I am concerned, because I think that if we fail to implement and enforce the budget, we are doing as much harm for this economy as failure to pass a budget in the first place.

Just so our colleagues know what apparently is in the Dannemeyer substitute, let me refer to the CBO analysis of the Dannemeyer substitute. First of all, in entitlements, the Dannemeyer substitute calls for reductions in entitlements of $44 billion over the next 3 years. Now that compares to the committee resolution entitlement reduction of about $12 to $13 billion, and that compares to President Reagan's second "Rose Garden" budget he agreed to a couple of weeks ago which reconciles about $12 to $13 billion. It compares to the entitlement reductions in the Latta substitute of about $23 billion.

So the question is: Are we really going to follow through with reconciliation and cut entitlement programs by $44 billion?

If you vote for the Dannemeyer substitute, you had better be prepared to do so.

According to the CBO some of those reductions would be an increase in the guaranteed student loan origination fee, a change in the social security disability claim process of $2.4 billion, and elimination of certain agricultural price supports for a savings of $17 billion. Now compare that just for reference sake to the recently passed House/Senate Conference on Agricultural Reform which saved $2.6 billion. Are you really prepared to go in and change the whole price support system this year before the election to save $17 billion in price supports?

It assumes phasing out general revenue sharing for savings of $12 billion.

On defense, it assumes increasing after inflation at a level of 8.3 percent in real growth, which is higher than the President's most recent budget.

In nondefense discretionary programs, the Dannemeyer substitute proposes outlay savings of $44 billion over 3 years, which is twice the amounts of cuts in the Latta substitute.

From the Grace Commission it assumes 3-year savings of $153 billion in both administrative and legislative actions, although it is not specific as to how that will be achieved.

In reconciliation directives, it directs 16 House committees to cut budget authority and outlays by $121 billion. That compares to the reconciliation instructions of roughly $12 to $13 billion that most of the other substitutes are looking at.

Those are some of the things that are assumed in the Dannemeyer substitute.

I offer this information just so everyone will know what it is they are voting on if they support this substitute. I hope if it were to pass, Members would be prepared to vote for all these things.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The figures that the gentleman has recited are over a 3-year span; are they not?

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. These are from CBO's analysis of the gentleman's substitute based on the information that the gentleman has given them.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Over a 3-year span?

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. That is correct.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. One final thing I would say, although I suppose the gentleman from California (Mr. DANNEMEYER) does not reconcile this or mandate this. Nevertheless, his substitute contemplates a flat rate tax which, if it is to replace the present amount of revenue that is now coming into the Treasury, would be about a 17-percent across-the-board rate of tax, with no deductions. That would be a substantial tax increase for all taxpayers in roughly the $40,000 income and below.

I am not going to argue whether it is good or bad, but I do think it is important that as we discuss these substitutes, we know exactly what they assume, and that we tell the American people that if we vote for these substitutes and they pass, we will come back and vote to enforce our decisions on the appropriations bills, on the reconciliation bills on the tax bills, and on others.

I submit that with all of the good intentions the gentleman from California has, the Congress and the President will not implement this budget and, therefore, this substitute should be voted down.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. I thank my colleague for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I can only point out—maybe I did not hear correctly—on the defense side, the defense level that is in this budget is consistent with the President's proposal of 7 percent after inflation. So we have not made a change on that.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. According to the CBO analysis, it assumes an 8.3-percent real growth in fiscal year 1985, using the DOD inflation assumptions.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Maybe the 8.3-percent real growth results in 7-percent growth after inflation. But the premise of this budget alternative on defense is $266 billion, which is 7 percent after inflation growth in 1985.

I respect what the gentleman has said very much, namely, that we in Congress are going to have to by voting on appropriation bills implement the changes, the spending cuts, that are talked about in this budget alternative. But I can respond to the gentleman this way: This is a representative body, and the American people want spending cuts rather than tax increases for us to balance the budget. And my response is that I think we are here to vote on whether or not we want to support spending cuts rather than tax increases, and that is one of the main reasons why I am presenting this alternative.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Basically, that takes a different position than President Reagan takes this year on his budget where he assumes both are needed. It takes a different position than most of the other substitutes. I respect the gentleman's willingness to offer it. All I am saying is, this is what it assumes. If you vote for it, know full well what you would be expected to do if it were to pass.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BLILEY).

Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from California does the American taxpayer a great service by bringing a true deficit-cutting budget to the floor today. This budget is the only one that reaffirms what the American people have so often expressed to each of us: That a sound economy is the best thing that Government can do for citizens.

The gentleman's alternative is the only resolution before us that properly recognizes that the answer to deficits is cutting spending and streamlining Federal management practices, rather than raising taxes. This budget places the burden of cutting our deficits equally on the Congress for program savings in all spending areas, and on the administration for savings through management initiatives. Other alternatives place the burden of our excesses on our constituent taxpayers.

The key to this alternative is that it does not pay for overspending by overtaxing, as do other budgets. Reducing deficits by raising taxes in ludicrous. The bottom line on a strong economy is how much the Government takes out of it. A balanced budget based on excessive taxation is just as bad or worse than a low-tax budget with a deficit. The gentleman has told us that the Congressional Budget Office finds that each 1-percent increase in America's GNP reduces the deficit by $325 billion over 5 years. That should be a clear signal that we cannot finance overspending by overtaxing without doing harm to the economy and taxpayers. The Dannemeyer alternative recognizes that.

The Dannemeyer alternative is the only budget before us today that has our priorities in the proper perspective. It makes a start at reducing the deficits that plague our economy. But it is more important to look at where that deficit reduction comes from. It does not make taxpayers pay for Congress mistakes. It makes Congress look at the way its programs work, and it makes the administration look at the way it manages those congressionally-mandated programs for savings. Other budgets pass the buck: They say, "Well, you're right, we messed up, but that's OK, because you're going to pay for it." How much sweeter a deal can you have than always having the taxpayer to saddle with the burden of your excesses?

We all decry the pain of deficits, and their bad effects on our economy. But those deficits are important because of what they represent. They represent what we are taking out of the economy—which is bad enough—but also that we are not paying for what we are taking out of the economy. This, in turn, causes Government to take even more out of the economy, to finance what we have already taken but not paid for. This cycle fair boggles the mind.

The Dannemeyer alternative does not pass the buck by making taxpayers foot the bill for Federal excess. It does not reduce deficits at the price of even greater intervention in the economy.

And it draws upon an important reservoir of information. The President's private sector survey on cost control—the Grace Commission—has already done the work for us. Passing a budget resolution setting spending and revenue targets is hard enough. But the reconciliation process of putting those cuts and raises into law is even more difficult. By drawing on recommendations of the Grace Commission, we can help that difficult process along.

The Grace Commission—which, by the way—was financed with private dollars, not taxpayers' dollars—has gone through Federal programs and their managing agencies and found where we can reduce unnecessary spending and wasteful management practices. The Dannemeyer budget alternative builds upon that research and the Commission's recommendations.

I cannot stress strongly enough that what we take out of the economy is what is important to look at. Every dollar that we raise in taxes is a dollar that might otherwise be devoted to hiring a new employee, or expanding an existing business, or buying a new car. Every dollar that we take in taxes to pay the interest on funds we have to borrow could be used to buy new clothes for our children, or pay for hospital care, or even contribute to charities to help the less fortunate. Every dollar that we take out of the economy in taxes is a dollar less that private companies and individuals have to invest in upgrading old plant and equipment, and means that we lose another step and another piece of some market to the Japanese and the Europeans. We could go on and on about what those dollars could be used for.

The Dannemeyer alternative emphasizes responsibility. It says "We know we're responsible for a lot of this mess, and we're willing to do what's necessary to put things rights."

Without responsible action on the Federal overspending front, we will have suffered through the latest recession for nothing. We will have put millions of Americans on the street without jobs, without the human necessities—and all for nothing. We will have made progress against inflation and nothing else, and only for the short term. We will have clamped down on our economy for nothing. Because without significant action on the spending front, we are destined to repeat this last recession over and over again. If we cannot learn from the mistakes of the last 30 years, we should not be here.

The time for partisan bickering is over. In the last 3 years, Republicans have blamed Democrats here and gone, and Democrats have blamed Republicans with equal vigor. While we are fiddling, America is burning. By raising taxes more, we are pouring federally-funded gasoline on that fire.

I urge my colleagues to support the Dannemeyer alternative in a nonpartisan fashion. We owe our constituents more leadership than we are giving them. We have the opportunity to demonstrate that leadership here today. I hope that we will not squander it.

I thank the gentleman from California for yielding, and I commend him for the hard work he has done in bringing this budget alternative to the floor.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER).

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, we were told a few minutes ago by the Budget Committee chairman that what we have to do is consider reality here. I think that is one thing that the people should do if they are going to look at this budget, because the reality of this budget is that it implements the Grace Commission reforms.

The American people have said over and over again, in poll after poll, in election after election, that what they want done is the budget reduced by cutting spending. The way in which you cut spending that goes along with the American people's thinking is that you cut spending by reforming Government, making it more manageable, doing the kinds of things that are necessary to make it more efficient and more effective. That is what the Grace Commission is going to do.

If we are going to accept reality that we cannot implement the Grace Commission reforms, I think we ought to know that anybody who opposes this budget is accepting that as reality, this Congress is incapable of instituting the Grace Commission reforms.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. If the gentleman will yield, all of the substitutes and the committee's budget adopt a whole range of Grace Commission reforms, some legislative, some administrative. Studying this substitute, I would like to ask this question: Of the $153 billion in Grace Commission savings, could the gentleman tell me how much of those have to be legislated and how much will be required to be saved by the administration in their administrative responsibilities?

Mr. WALKER. It is my understanding in this budget that a great number of them are regarded as being legislative, but it does exclude a number of the major Grace Commission reforms. For instance, it excludes military retirement reform, it excludes a long-term civil service retirement reform, it excludes the sale of all the power marketing administration reforms, it excludes the reforms suggested by the Grace Commission on Federal subsidies. In other words, there are a number of things which are not in there.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. I wanted to know what it included.

Mr. WALKER. As the gentleman knows, I have 2 minutes here. There is an entire paper here that goes through these, and a large portion of them are in fact the reforms that are anticipated legislatively.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. If we could have a copy of that, I would appreciate it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER) has expired.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Pennsylvania 2 additional minutes.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Could we have a copy of that?

Mr. WALKER. I would say to the gentleman from Oklahoma that we do have copies of the presentation over here.

I would also say that the gentleman makes a point when he suggests that a large portion of that entitlement money that is in there comes out of the farm income. I come from a heavy farming district. Most of the farmers in my district would like to see us go back to the free market in farms, and I would think that they might want to consider in an election year that one of the things we ought to be doing is changing our programs so that interest rates could come down for them, so that Federal spending comes down.

Also, I would say that the gentleman from California made the point that if his budget were adopted, with just a 1-percent increase in GNP, we would have his budget balanced by 1989.

Well, I think that is something we ought to consider, that what the gentleman has brought to us is a balanced budget, because there is no doubt in my mind that with a 2-percent cut in interest that would certainly result from the gentleman's proposal and a 2-percent cut in the unemployment rate that would surely result from the gentleman's proposal, we would get that 1-percent increase in GNP. So what we are really considering here is the only balanced budget that will be brought to the floor as well.

So I would suggest to the Members that if they want to vote and say that the reality is that this House cannot institute the Grace Commission reforms, then you vote against the Dannemeyer budget. But I would suggest that is a bad vote. If you want to vote against the only true balanced budget attempt that will be brought to the floor, vote that way, but I would suggest that that is not a vote that would be appreciated by the American people. I would suggest a yes vote on the Dannemeyer budget.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. I thank my colleague for his comments.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. MCCANDLESS).

Mr. MCCANDLESS. I thank my colleague, the gentleman from California, for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the substitute offered by my colleague from California, Mr. DANNEMEYER.

The Dannemeyer substitute is unique among the eight substitutes that will be offered as it is not premised on the faulty assumption that the deficit is so high because taxes are too low. All of the other budget proposals rely on another large tax increase to reduce the deficit.

The question must be asked: Do tax increases reduce the deficit ? A review of recent history clearly indicates the answer to that question is "no." Since 1970, Federal revenues—taxes—have increased nearly 3½ times. During the same period of time, the deficit grew astronomically. In 1982, Congress passed the largest tax increase in history, TEFRA, which was billed as a deficit reduction measure, and yet the deficit continued to grow.

It is apparent that tax increases will not solve the deficit crisis, yet they are the cornerstone of the other proposals. I suggest to my colleagues that the "crisis" is on the other side of the ledger—expenditures are too high. The Dannemeyer budget recognizes this fact and reduces the deficit by placing long overdue restraints on Federal spending.

A budget resolution is a blueprint for the operation of the Federal Government for 1 year. Consequently, it is improbable that any resolution will be completely satisfactory. Such is the case with this substitute. While we all may have reservations about individual items contained within or omitted from this budget, it meets the goal of reducing the deficit by controlling Federal spending and not by resorting to yet another fleecing of the American taxpayer.

Therefore, I urge my colleagues to support the Dannemeyer substitute.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. LUNGREN).

Mr. LUNGREN. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, there has been a lot of discussion here about how we ought to best take care of the deficit as we see before us. One of the points attempted to be stressed by the gentleman from California (Mr. DANNEMEYER) and others is that we have over the last number of years, every year, increased our tax revenue. We have had a number of tax increases, many of them involuntary by bracket creep, and yet we have the deficits grow larger and larger.

Just 1 year ago, or a year and a half ago, we passed a major tax increase, and within weeks, the deficit did not go down, the deficit went up—at least all projections with respect to the deficit. One of the things that people fail to realize is impact on the private sector will be essentially the same whether you take funds away from it by virtue of taxes or whether you take it by virtue of borrowing those funds away from it.

The effect is virtually the same; there is less money, there is less oxygen given to the private sector. So, the gentleman from California (Mr. DANNEMEYER) has presented to us a budget here that does not base its whole activity on the premise that the primary way to reduce the deficit is to increase tax rates. Rather, it looks at spending cuts.

Everybody seems to be for spending cuts; we have a number of proposals in the House at the present time for bipartisan commissions to do this or to do that. Of course, this Chamber contains the bipartisan commission that is supposed to reduce deficits; the elected officials of the American people, the House of Representatives.

In addition to that, we have already had a bipartisan commission come in, the Grace Commission, which has made a number of recommendations. As usual, when you attempt to challenge the conventional wisdom, what happens is that you are not seriously considered. That was the initial reaction to the Grace Commission recommendations.

It was thought that they could not be serious to suggest that we could save this amount of money. And the bureaucracy does not believe that; the Members of the House evidently, up to this point, do not believe that. The Members of the Senate do not believe that.

The establishment here in Washington just does not believe that we can make those changes. The Grace Commission have given us an opportunity to try and do that. I would suggest that we go along with Mr. DANNEMEYER and at least try that this time, if we possibly can.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1 minute to ask the gentleman a question.

The Grace Commission recommended $97 billion in savings in defense over the next 3 years but that does not seem to show up in the totals in the Dannemeyer substitute.

Is there a reason for that?

Mr. LUNGREN. The Dannemeyer substitute does have savings in defense. The Dannemeyer substitute approaches the defense spending from the standpoint of where we are and then does it on a percentage-increase basis. So the numbers do not precisely match those of the Grace Commission.

At the same time, it is premised on the fact that we can make savings from those found in the Grace Commission. As the gentleman from Oklahoma knows, the Grace Commission does not go into weapons systems but rather goes into management and other changes that may take place in the Defense Establishment.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, in response to the chairman of the Budget Committee, Mr. JONES, my colleague, I can say that in this budget alternative it proposes savings in defense of $67.8 billion over the next 3 years. That is not all of the Grace Commission recommendations.

In nondefense it is $64.1 billion, for a total, from the Grace Commission recommendations of $131 billion. I have a complete list over here. It is this thick. If you want to find out chapter and verse, it is right in here. You are welcome to take it home and read it this evening, because I am sure it will give you good bedtime reading and keep you awake all night trying to figure out how we are going to save this money.

Really what it comes down to is that the only way we are going to tame this runaway monster is by cutting spending; not by raising taxes. That is the spirit in which it is offered.

I have a few moments left under the rule, and I would like to just make a recitation of some of these program cuts in the national defense area that may be of interest to the Members.

Bear in mind the Grace Commission produced 2,478 recommendations. The volumes are several feet high, in case you are interested to read them for yourself as to what they are talking about. But they have done a credible, responsible job.

These are the recommendations that in part, relate to the suggested reductions in defense. Military personnel; reevaluate the 1980 decision to reduce tours of service from 30 to 18 months; improve administration of selected reenlistment program by eliminating payments where no retention problems exist; adopt Army regimental concept.

Operations and maintenance; study issue of base realinement; close bases where significant savings exist. I will be the first to admit that this is a difficult choice for anybody serving in this body: the thought of having a military base closed in his or her district. But, my friends, we have to face reality, we cannot go on as we are. There are many bases around this country that have long ago ceased to have any particular utility to the national defense needs of this country. Somebody has to be given the authority and we are the body that has to execute the authority because we are the ones that appropriate the money. This was one of the recommendations of the Grace Commission.

Improve supply system inventory management; increase cost sharing for military health care services; consolidate DOD health care management among services.

In the area of procurement, improve the efficiency of weapons acquisition system by requiring more realistic cost estimates in selected acquisition reviews to Congress; make the procurement process more stable by expanding the use of multiyear budgeting, multiyear contracting, eliminating stretchouts. Inject more competition into procurement through greater use of dual sourcing and competitive spare parts purchases.

Those are just some of the recommendations in the defense area. In social security and medicare, let me say to my colleagues that nothing in this budget assumes or suggests that we are going to cut any beneficiary of social security.

In addition, there is nothing in this budget resolution that says we are going to take away the COLA's from social security recipients, and anybody that tells you otherwise is just misinforming you, because it is not in this document. You cannot find it because it is not part of the recommendation.

Mr. DENNY SMITH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DANNEMEYER. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. DENNY SMITH. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, is this budget proposal going to get us to a balanced budget quicker than any other proposal before us?

Mr. DANNEMEYER. I believe that is a correct statement because it has the lowest deficit for 1985, and the lowest deficit for 1987 and 1989.

Mr. DENNY SMITH. The gentleman does that without raising any taxes so that basically the problem is on the spending side and you are attacking that directly without having to raise taxes on the American population, as you pointed out earlier?

Mr. DANNEMEYER. That is the distinguishing feature of this budget alternative. It does not propose an increase in taxes over the existing tax system.

Mr. DENNY SMITH. Would the gentleman say in this whole process that we have been involved in, our leader earlier said that this is a totally flawed process, but in the situation we are in, certainly, if this gets us to the balanced budget the quickest, it would be the best way for a working American to receive the fruits of his labor. Is that right?

Mr. DANNEMEYER. I think that is a fair statement. I would like, for instance, as a part of this budget process, if we could establish that the levels of spending in the different categories would be fixed for all programs operating in the Federal Government so that when we adopt this budget resolution, that is the binding level. But, unfortunately, that feature is not present. I hope some day it will be.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, do we close out the debate then?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman reserved 3 minutes, the balance of his time.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, we only have one more speaker.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman would be the closing speaker.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time. Do I have the privilege of closing, since it is my budget alternative?

The CHAIRMAN. No; the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. JONES) has the privilege of closing debate.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRIES

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Chairman, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Chairman, since it is my budget alternative, do I have the privilege of closing?

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MICHEL) closed the debate. Those in opposition to the substitutes close the debate, as I understand the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma stated that the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MICHEL) did close the debate; he was opposed to the amendment. Therefore, the gentleman from Oklahoma, (Mr. JONES), who is opposed to the amendment, will close this debate.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, does that mean we are going to operate from here on with the idea that on all budgets that the opposition to them are going to have the right to close?

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, these are amendments made in order by the Rules Committee. As under the 5-minute rule, the opponents have the right to close debate.

Mr. WALKER. Further parliamentary inquiry. So I understand then, that on all the budget presentations that will be out here, that the opposition to those budgets will have the opportunity to close debate?

Mr. DANNEMEYER. I have a parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Chairman, are we operating under the 5-minute rule right now?

The CHAIRMAN. We are operating under a special procedure, but it is under the principle of the 5-minute rule.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Chairman, I have a further parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Under that procedure, I, as the proponent of this measure, with the burden of going forward, am not entitled to close? Is that what is being disclosed?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct. As the gentleman may remember, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MICHEL) was opposed to the last amendment and he closed debate.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I have a further parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALKER. Then I understand that under the process, because the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. JONES) will be opposing most of the amendments that come out here other than the committee amendment, the gentleman from Oklahoma, (Mr. JONES) the committee chairman, is going to be virtually given the chance to close all debate on all amendments out here?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not aware of who is going to rise in opposition to all the amendments. Those who rise in opposition to the amendments will be the persons who will be entitled to close the debates.

Mr. WALKER. I have a further parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALKER. On the minority side, if we are in opposition to some of the budgets that are going to come out, and the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. JONES) is in opposition to the budgets that come out, which side will be given the opportunity to close at that point?

The CHAIRMAN. It all depends upon who is controlling the time, like all the other amendments. The rule specifically states that it is a person opposed who is controlling the time.

Mr. WALKER. I have a further parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALKER. The gentleman from California is controlling the time.

The CHAIRMAN. Controlling the time in opposition to the amendments.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I have a further parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALKER. When the minority side has a half hour of time, as I assume we will have on some of these amendments, then we will get a chance to close the debate, rather than the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. JONES)?

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. JONES) offers an amendment, then the minority has the right to close the debate.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I have a further parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALKER. That does not answer my question. Let us assume that we get another amendment out here, when the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. ROEMER) comes out, the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. JONES) will be in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. ROEMER) based upon what he has said previously, and there may be somebody on the minority side who will be.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. JONES) will be controlling the time and he will have the right to close the debate.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. In a spirit of comity, Mr. Chairman, I am not going to dispute the Chair, but I will be happy to let the gentleman close the debate if he wishes, with his last 3 minutes.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Chairman, I thank my colleague.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Oklahoma. I think that makes it much better.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman may waive his right on this matter.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. PANETTA).

Mr. PANETTA. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I think it was H. L. Mencken who said for every problem there is always a nice, simple solution that is always wrong. I think the proposal before the House is the epitome of H. L. Mencken's comment.

Those who would like to posture on a simple solution that is not only wrong but is not going anywhere, this is it.

The test, again, it seems to me on all the resolutions has to be what is the size of the deficit reduction, is it fair, is it doable? The deficit number without question is a large one, $206 billion being reduced on the deficit over 3 years.

The next question, though, I think is most important. Is it fair in the way it is accomplished? What it proposes is a reduction close to $200 billion off of domestic spending, largely impacting on entitlement programs and nondefense discretionary, that impact on the people in the most need in our society. It takes almost $200 billion in cuts there. On revenues, it is zero. But what it does provide in revenues is additional user fees. Who do user fees impact the most? People who are just managing to get by.

It provides, in addition to that, increases in defense of 7 percent in real growth, roughly approximating some $49 billion over the next 3 years.

So if we put that package together, the sole place that this budget relies on for deficit reduction are in the areas of entitlements and nondefense discretionary, period. I do not think by anybody's book that is a fair approach to deficit reduction.

The last point, which I think is the most important, is: Is this proposal doable? Can it be accomplished? I realize that the Grace Commission report is going to be used as the magic elixir to solve all of our problems. It will take care of colds and it will take care of deficits and everything else.

The reality is that even the CBO and the General Accounting Office, in analyzing what Mr. Grace himself said would be savings of $400 billion over the next 3 years, determined that at most we are looking at $97 billion that is doable. In this proposal, the Grace Commission suggestion is somewhere around $153 billion that would be included if this budget resolution is adopted.

It is not going to happen. It is not going to happen. Phasing out a farmer's home loan, cutting of price supports for agriculture to the tune of $17 billion, health care for veterans, a series of other proposals that simply are not going to happen.

So if you want a simple solution that is wrong, then vote for Dannemeyer. Otherwise, we ought to oppose this substitute.

Mr. MACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PANETTA. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. MACK. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, the point has been made several times by the gentleman in the well, and also the chairman, that the question that ought to be raised here is: Is it do-able? I guess I am again asking the gentleman where he was last year and why was that question not raised last year about a budget that you put together that talked about raising $73 billion when, in fact, we had information from, I think, the Committee on Ways and Means, that said the best we could do is maybe raise $8 billion?

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PANETTA. I would be pleased to yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, last year in the debate, in all the meetings that I had, that was a point that I tried to stress. As a matter of fact, even the $73 billion came down from what the House originally recommended. That $73 billion was agreed on by Democrats and Republicans alike at a conference and voted by both.

Mr. MACK. Not in this House. Not in this House, and that is what we are speaking about today. What is doable?

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. I say out of the conference on the budget it was, indeed. The point is, it was not implemented. We cannot make that mistake again.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. May I inquire of the chair how much time I have remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California (Mr. DANNEMEYER) has 3 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. JONES) has 18 minutes remaining.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I might take a minute here to make two points about last year's budget.

First of all, the reconciliation bill was sent over to the other body where it was not acted upon. So on reconciliation we accomplished at least three-quarters of what we said we would do in the budget.

Second, with regard to taxes, the tax bill that came up in the fall was defeated on the rule. There was a previous tax bill, however, that would have saved about $50 billion of that $73 billion. That tax bill put a lid, a cap, on the third year of the Kemp-Roth tax bill. That passed the House, was sent to the other body, and was defeated there.

So I think the House last year largely implemented the budget. It died mostly in the other body. But without pointing fingers at any side of the Congress or either party, I think it is terribly important to keep before us this year the major issue: These deficits are large and growing. This economy so depends on what we do about these deficits. Whatever we say we are going to do tonight or tomorrow night, we must actually enforce it as the next month unfolds.

That is the whole point that I want every Member of this body to keep in mind as we take these budget resolution substitutes up. Let us be serious. Let us know what we are voting on, and once we vote on the process and the resolution, let us be willing to implement it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. JONES) yield back his time?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California (Mr. DANNEMEYER) to close debate.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the Chair for the privilege of closing.

My colleague, the gentleman from California (Mr. PANETTA), made reference to the fact—and I think he misspoke and I will say it again so that this matter is in perspective—that we picked up recommendations of the Grace Commission over the next 3 fiscal years of $67.8 billion as a reduction in defense, $64.1 billion in nondefense, and $53.2 billion in non-Grace Commission savings, making the total, along with the market plan for credit budget and net interest savings, of some $200 billion in reductions over the next 3 years. Also he alluded to the fact that the CBO has analyzed the work product of the Grace Commission.

That is true, they have. But they have only analyzed 396 of the 2,478 recommendations, or 16 percent of them. Now, those 396 comprise some $379 billion of the $424 billion of the Grace Commission savings over 3 years.

But what the gentleman from California did not say was that the CBO made no assessment for 122 items of the Grace Commission recommendations, totaling 31 percent, for a total of $87.7 billion, nor did they make any assessment of the recommendations, 2,082 of them for a savings of $61.3 billion.

The point is that the work product of the CBO has barely scratched the surface of critically analyzing what the Grace Commission recommended, and I am suggesting that in this alternative budget our recommendation is modest.

Finally, let me make this observation: I think we are at this process in the House of Representatives in terms of criticizing the budget reduction suggestions that are in this budget, and I think it is fair for this Member from California to ask anybody who criticizes these proposed reductions this question: "If you don't like these changes, if you don't like these recommendations, what are yours?"

We are at the point, and if Members do not have the courage to vote in favor of supporting these spending reductions, I would ask, "What spending reductions would you like to propose that I can vote for?" To stand around and just throw cold water on these I do not think is really being constructive. So I will say it again: "What are your proposed spending reductions?"

Finally, let me make this observation: The problem in this institution is the Congress of the United States. In each of the last 5 years we have exceeded our own budget resolution to the total of $153 billion. If we had stuck with our own budget resolutions over the last 5 years, we would substantially wipe out the deficit. The enemy is right here. It is us.

Mr. Chairman, I ask for the support of the Members of this modest spending reduction.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California (Mr. DANNEMEYER) has expired. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. DANNEMEYER).

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The Clerk announced the following pair:

On this vote:

Mr. Gramm for, with Mr. Boehlert against.

Messrs. MARTIN of North Carolina, DUNCAN, MOORE, CHAPPIE, WIRTH, SPENCE, WINN, and LEWIS of Florida changed their votes from "aye" to "no."

So the amendment in the nature of a substitute was rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

AMENDMENT IN THE NATURE OF A SUBSTITUTE OFFERED BY MR. ROEMER

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will designate the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The text of the amendment in the nature of a substitute is as follows:

Amendment in the Nature of a Substitute offered by Mr. ROEMER: Strike out all after the resolving clause of House Concurrent Resolution 280 and insert:

That the Congress hereby determines and declares that the concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1984 is hereby revised and replaced, the first concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1985 is hereby established, and the appropriate budgetary levels for fiscal years 1986 and 1987 are hereby set forth:

(a) The following budgetary levels are appropriate for the fiscal years beginning on October 1, 1983, October 1, 1984, October 1, 1985, and October 1, 1986:

(1) The recommended levels of Federal revenues are as follows:

Fiscal year 1984: $665,000,000,000.
Fiscal year 1985: $744,800,000,000.
Fiscal year 1986: $818,800,000,000.
Fiscal year 1987: $897,300,000,000.

and the amounts by which the aggregate levels of Federal revenues should be increased are as follows:

Fiscal year 1984: $2,000,000,000.
Fiscal year 1985: $11,800,000,000.
Fiscal year 1986: $23,900,000,000.
Fiscal year 1987: $33,800,000,000.

(2) The appropriate levels of total new budget authority are as follows:

Fiscal year 1984: $913,381,000,000.
Fiscal year 1985: $1,001,333,000,000.
Fiscal year 1986: $1,086,426,000,000.
Fiscal year 1987: $1,179,061,000,000.

(3) The appropriate levels of total budget outlays are as follows:

Fiscal year 1984: $852,118,000,000.
Fiscal year 1985: $915,951,000,000.
Fiscal year 1986: $976,787,000,000.
Fiscal year 1987: $1,055,156,000,000.

(4) The amounts of the deficits in the budget which are appropriate in the light of economic conditions and all other relevant factors are as follows:

Fiscal year 1984: $187,118,000,000.
Fiscal year 1985: $171,151,000,000.
Fiscal year 1986: $157,987,000,000.
Fiscal year 1987: $157,856,000,000.

(5) The appropriate levels of the public debt are as follows:

RECONCILIATION

SEC. 2. (a) Not later than May 1, 1984, the House committees named in subsections (b) through (i)(1) of this section shall submit their recommendations to the House Budget Committee. After receiving those recommendations, the Committee on the Budget shall report to the House a reconciliation bill or resolution or both carrying out all such recommendations without any substantive revision.

(c) The House Committee on Armed Services shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce outlays by $423,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of outlays by $767,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of outlays by $1,170,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(d) The House Committee on Education and Labor shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce outlays by $2,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of outlays by $6,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of outlays by $9,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(e) The House Committee on Energy and Commerce shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority by $2,000,000 and outlays by $71,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of budget authority by $3,000,000 and outlays by $168,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of budget authority by $5,000,000 and outlays by $272,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(f) The House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce outlays by $523,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of outlays by $1,061,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of outlays by $1,563,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(g) The House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee sufficient to reduce outlays by $8,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of $16,000,000 in budget authority and $16,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of $24,000,000 in budget authority and $24,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1987.

(h) The House Committee on Foreign Affairs shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority by $2,000,000 and outlays by $5,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of budget authority by $4,000,000 and outlays by $10,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of budget authority by $6,000,000 and outlays by $16,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(i)(1) The House Committee on Ways and Means shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce outlays by $3,655,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of outlays by $7,418,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of outlays by $11,769,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

SEC. 5. (a) If Congress has not completed action by October 1, 1984, on the concurrent resolution on the budget required to be reported under section 310(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 for the 1985 fiscal year, then this concurrent resolution shall be deemed to be the concurrent resolution required to be reported under section 310(a) of such Act, for the purposes of the prohibitions contained in section 311 of such Act, notwithstanding congressional action or inaction on any reconciliation requirements contained in this concurrent resolution.

(b) Section 311(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, as made applicable by subsection (a) of this section, shall not apply to bills, resolutions, or amendments within the jurisdiction of a committee, or any conference report on any such bill or resolution, if—

(1) the enactment of such bill or resolution as reported;

(2) the adoption and enactment of such amendment; or

(3) the enactment of such bill or resolution in the form recommended in such conference report; would not cause the appropriate allocation for such committee of new discretionary budget authority or new spending authority as described in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 made pursuant to section 302(a) of such Act for fiscal year 1985 to be exceeded.

(c) The provisions of this section shall cease to apply when Congress completes action on a subsequent concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1985 pursuant to section 304 or 310 of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974.

SECTION 302(b) FILING REQUIREMENT

SEC. 7. (a) It shall not be in order in the House of Representatives to consider any bill or resolution, or amendment thereto, providing—

(1) new budget authority for fiscal year 1985;

(2) new spending authority described in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act first effective in fiscal year 1985; or

(3) direct loan authority, primary loan guarantee authority, or secondary loan guarantee authority for fiscal year 1985;

within the jurisdiction of any committee which has received an allocation pursuant to section 302(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of discretionary budget authority or new spending authority, as described above, for such fiscal year, unless and until such committee makes the allocation or subdivisions required by section 302(b) of the Congressional Budget Act, in connection with the most recently agreed to concurrent resolution on the budget.

(b) The prohibition contained in subsection (a) shall not apply until twenty-one days of continuous session, as defined in section 1011(5) of the Impoundment Control Act of 1974, after Congress completes action on this concurrent resolution.

COST-OF-LIVING ADJUSTMENTS

The COLA=C.P.I. minus 2 provisions of this budget do not affect the "means-tested" entitlements (SSI, AFDC, Medicaid, food stamps, school lunch, WIC and Pell grants) or Veterans Compensation and Veterans Pensions. Medicare is affected only to the extent of $4 billion in reductions over three years (1985, $1.0 billion; 1986, $1.4 billion; and 1987, $1.6 billion.)

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to House Resolution 476, the amendment is considered as having been read.

The gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. ROEMER) will be recognized for 30 minutes, and a Member opposed will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair now recognizes the distinguished gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. ROEMER).

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to talk for the next few minutes by way of a brief explanation about a budget that several dozen of us have worked on for some time. It has been called in a shorthand version, the 2-percent solution.

The 2-percent solution is not an easy budget and, therefore, some will not vote for it. It is difficult to understand. It is not a budget that takes a simple view of a complex problem. Therefore, some of us just cannot bring ourselves to make a difficult decision.

But I believe after you hear our explanation that you would agree that we meet our stated goals.

First, a budget that makes enough reduction in the deficit to be significant in the sense that interest rates would be lowered. Some have called this the 2-percent solution because we take COLA minus 2 or indexing minus 2 or 2 percent from the President's military 7 percent. That is not why we call it 2 percent. We say if we make a significant enough reduction in the deficit that interest rates will drop 2 percent, and that is the best news we could give to America.

Our second goal was to ask something of everybody. The real temptation when you put a budget together is to ask something of no one in your camp, make sure the sacrifice comes from everybody else. Our approach was a little different. We asked a little something from everybody.

Finally we use real figures. We use CBO scrubbed figures. We worked with JIM JONES in the Budget Committee looking at the assumptions behind the budget. We have not put a lot of Grace Commission savings in here. In fact, we have zero when we think we could have gotten an additional $10 or $15 billion.

A significant reduction in deficits to lower interest rates, a little bit of sacrifice from everybody in real figures. We hold the military spending to 5 percent real growth. That is a cut from the President's baseline of $76 billion in the next 3 years. It was our feeling that we could save that money without harming the military defense of our Nation.

On entitlements, we took a little sacrifice. I do not want to discount it or make it easy. I want you to listen to me carefully. We asked everyone on a COLA program, except those that were means tested, the poor, and except the veterans who had suffered disability in war who were on some disability, we asked everybody else to take COLA next year minus 2 percent; no cut in benefits, but a cut in growth. We saved on that $20 billion.

In other spending we had what we called a soft freeze. We allowed for entitlement growth means tested. We allowed for mandatory spending to continue. In no way did we hold the dollar figures the same, but where we could we froze. A soft freeze saving about $14 billion.

Finally, on taxes, we took the dollar amount from H.R. 4170, as did everybody else, with one or two exceptions, and added to that indexing minus 2 percent for 3 years. We did not eliminate indexing. We support it. We did not stop indexing. We support it.

We asked for some small give back. That was not easy. That does not make us happy. But we do not see how we can lower the deficit without tax reformation. We do not see how we can lower the deficit without taking something from the military. We do not see how we can lower the deficit without reducing entitlements by those 2 percentage points.

I think it is a fair budget. I think it is one that the American people can support, and I urge your consideration.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROEMER. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. The $29 billion 3-year reconciliation reduction, does that include the CPI minus 2 percent; is that a major, big portion of it?

Mr. ROEMER. I am sorry; could the gentleman repeat his question?

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. The $29 billion 3-year outlay reduction under the reconciliation instructions.

Mr. ROEMER. That includes the $4 billion in medicare that your Budget Committee took plus $24.6 billion in COLA reductions. That is the only entitlement cuts we made. We cut health no other way.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. JONES) is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time at this point.

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to our colleague, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. STENHOLM).

Mr. STENHOLM. Mr. Chairman, our Federal deficit must be reduced. Only the Congress can reduce the deficit. To reduce the deficit, we have only three choices: cut spending, raise taxes, or do both. The fiscal year 1985 budget has been the inspiration for a number of alternatives. Some of these alternatives achieve savings through spending cuts, some through tax increases, and some achieve savings through smoke and mirrors. But I submit that the best method for reducing the deficit is through a well-balanced package of spending reductions and revenue increases. There is such an alternative in the 2-percent solution. And do not be fooled by the label; this is no quick-fix or gimmick budget. This budget is realistic, fair, and equitable. It reduces spending by 2 to 1 over tax increases, and it does so across the board.

In relation to the 2-percent solution, consider the four general categories of spending in the Federal budget: nondefense discretionary spending; interest on the Federal debt; defense; and entitlement programs.

The 2-percent solution proposes a cut in nondefense discretionary spending totaling $24.5 billion over 3 years, compared to the amounts needed to maintain current services. This cut would be accomplished through a 3-year freeze on overall domestic discretionary spending.

Moving on to the second category, the interest on the national debt is projected to take up approximately 13 percent of the budget for fiscal year 1985. Try as we might, there is no way to cut that directly. About all that can be done at this point is to adopt a budget which addresses the growing size of the Federal debt, and does not add significantly to it. Note that I said "doesn't add significantly to it." Unfortunately, all of the budgetary proposals (all eight) now under consideration contribute to the national debt.

With defense spending taking up approximately 30 percent of the Federal budget, and entitlements taking up 47 percent of spending, any realistic attempt to control spending cannot fail to address the growth in these two areas of the budget.

In the area of defense, the Budget Committee provides for defense spending increases of 3.5 pecent per year real growth, as compared with the President's compromise of 7 percent per year real growth. Like all Members of the House, I believe in a strong defense, and like all of my colleagues, I have my own convictions about how we can best maintain a strong defense. The 2-percent solution provides for real growth in defense spending of 5 percent above the rate of inflation in each of the next 3 fiscal years, or 2 percent below the President's revised budget and 2 percent above the Budget Committee recommendation. For those of you who have reservations about the ability of a 5-percent real growth in defense spending being able to meet our defense needs, let me say that I share your concerns. Let me also add, however, that I am willing to make this concession because I am equally concerned about the impact which increased deficit spending is having on the economy. I also believe that we can build upon our defense posture with a 5-percent real growth, and I recognize that there are areas of waste within the defense, and perhaps a leaner budget can help to ferret out this waste.

Now we come to that part of the budget which comprises the largest portion: entitlements spending. The Congress has been understandably reluctant to address the entitlements issue in the past; this very reluctance, however, helps to explain why entitlements have ballooned, and why we appear powerless to control them. The harsh reality is that cost-of-living adjustments (COLA's) based on the Consumer Price Index (CPI) have lead to commitments beyond our national means.

On the subject of the CPI, let me remind you that the CPI was originally designed as an indicator of the price changes that affect the consumption expenditures of a household. Over the years, however, the CPI has increasingly been used as a measure of the escalation of income payments needed to maintain a constant standard of living. The CPI was never designed for such use and has serious shortcomings as such an escalator. For instance, the housing component has contributed to significant increases in the CPI because of the rapid rise of house and mortgage interest rates; only a small fraction of homeowners are currently involved in the market for houses or mortgages, however.

The General Accounting Office has estimated that automatic COLA's accounted for at least half of the total growth in entitlement benefits during the 1990's. Current projections show that entitlements spending will surpass $2 trillion over the next 5 years. Because of their rapid growth and sheer size, entitlement programs must be one focal point of fiscal restraint. Increased taxes alone will not control this area of spending.

Social security spending will account for approximately one-fifth of all Federal spending projected for fiscal year 1985. According to a CBO study, social security recipients still receive more than 80 percent of the annual COLA's. It is worth noting that each percentage point increase in the CPI adds $1.4 billion to annual social security costs.

The 2-percent solution equitably and effectively curbs entitlements spending through the use of the CPI-minus-2 (CPI minus 2) formula. Under this proposal, COLA's would be held to 2 percent below inflation, except for means-tested programs. This provision would save $24.6 billion over 3 years.

I would like to emphasize that the CPI-minus-2 option would not apply to means-tested programs such as supplemental security income, veterans pensions, school lunch and food stamps. Any savings in social security would remain in the trust funds for payment to current and future beneficiaries.

It is true that the CPI-minus-2 option would modify the indexing provision of the income tax, which is due to take effect in 1985. I was an early proponent of tax indexing because I felt it would give lower and middle income taxpayers a break, and would also bring another degree of accountability into Congress revenue-raising practices. CPI minus 2 will have an effect on tax indexing, but it will do so in a straightforward temporary equitable manner. Again, the 2-percent solution makes cuts, and requests sacrifices, all across the board.

This proposal makes significant savings by relatively simple legislative action. This budget achieves its goals both by raising revenues and making spending cuts; this is the only realistic method for addressing deficit spending. The burden is spread across the board, and finally, this budget requires concessions of political principles by both Democrats and Republicans.

In voting for a deficit-reduction budget package, keep in mind that our responsibility extends beyond our current constituents to the grandchildren and great-grandchildren who will follow, and who will ultimately pay for the folly of unchecked Federal spending. Please join me in supporting the 2-percent solution.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. DONNELLY), a member of the committee.

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Chairman, let me at the outset congratulate my good friend from Louisiana and my friend from Texas for taking this bold approach at deficit reduction. There is no question that if this House adopted the Roemer substitute, we would have a 3-year deficit reduction package of $225.1 billion; significant.

The problem that I have with the approach is twofold: First, in the area of COLA's, the gentleman from Louisiana is recommending that we reduce COLA's 2 percent across the board for all non-needs-tested entitlement programs.

Now, on the face of that it sounds very fair. But the problem is that the present COLA system is innately unfair. The reason COLA's were instituted years ago was to protect people from the ravages of inflation. But the problem is that COLA's are based on a percentage; we are talking about real dollars. Just quickly, for example a social security annuitant of $10,000 at a 10-percent COLA would receive an additional $1,000 a year. Another annuitant at a $40,000 yearly annuity, at a 10-percent COLA receives $4,000 a year.

There is an innate unfairness in across-the-board COLA's. I suggest to this body that an across-the-board 2-percent reduction only enacts and increases that innate unfairness. I do not think there is anybody in this institution who does not understand and is not committed to doing something about the entitlement problem and the entitlement crisis that we face in terms of fiscal policy.

I just suggest that this is not the way to do it.

The second problem that I have is with the recommendation for a 3-year freeze on domestic discretionary, programs. That is simple and I think simplicity sells. But the problem is there are some domestic discretionary programs that probably ought to be cut and there are some that maybe ought to be eliminated, but then again there are domestic discretionary programs that ought to be increased and ought to be increased substantially.

The problem I have with the Roemer substitute is that it is simple; it is very, very simple. I hope that the lessons we have learned over the course of the last 3 years in terms of simplicity and the problems they have caused this country in terms of economic policy will make us think before individuals cast their votes in the favor of the Roemer substitute. Simplicity sells, but may I suggest simplicity does not always make good economic policy.

Mr. STENHOLM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONNELLY. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. STENHOLM. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I find myself in substantial agreement with the two major points the gentleman (Mr. DONNELLY) makes. It is difficult to come up with a solution that is in fact completely fair and equitable. We thank him for his comments in saying that we have come close.

I totally agree with him that when we talk about freezing without increasing that you can get into problems. But the point is we have major deficits. And any of the proposals that we will vote on, even the Dannemeyer that just went down, even if Dannemeyer had passed with the tremendous reductions that he had had in his budget, we would still look at $503 billion in deficits over the next 3 years.

Mr. DONNELLY. Let me just say if I could reclaim my time, I do not think there is any argument either amongst us on this side of the aisle or between the aisles about the magnitude of the problem of the deficit.

The question is, How do we get significant and equitable and fair deficit reduction? I suggest to the Members of this body that the Roemer approach is not the way to go.

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. MONTGOMERY).

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I thank the Chair.

First I would like to take this opportunity to thank the Speaker of the House and the Rules Committee and also Mr. JONES for giving us the opportunity to offer this amendment. This is the first time in 3 years that our group has had the opportunity to present our ideas.

I would also like to commend the two gentlemen, the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. ROEMER) and the gentleman from Texas (Mr. STENHOLM), who have done a lot of work on the 2 percent amendment which is before t tonight.

I would like to touch on that t amendment was not just thrown gether. We have been working on for several months now. As I mentioned earlier, we had tried to present an amendment such as this several years ago, but we were not able to do it.

Because of the Speaker and because of the Rules Committee, this really is our first shot, so we hope Members on both sides of the aisle will give us the opportunity to at least listen to the amendment.

The gentleman from Massachusetts made some points, but every budget presented in the next 24 hours someone will not like something in it. We think we have good ideas on our proposal. We think we have a good approach. We tackle every person just a little. We do not penalize certain groups, our approach is across the board. It is a commonsense approach. We do not take all the savings out of defense as a number of amendments that the Members will have tonight or tomorrow before them that reduce defense too much. We give a 5-percent true growth in military spending.

We treat the COLA's fairly. I disagree with the gentleman who just talked before me. I think it is fair to treat all the COLA's alike. Anybody who draws a Government COLA check should be treated the same way, whether it is social security or whether it is civilian retirement or a military retirement.

On domestic spending, we do make some savings. We try to keep the safety net and protect the real needy.

Also pertaining to the Roemer amendment we do raise taxes. We support H.R. 4170 and we support indexing of taxes, CPI minus 2 percent.

Now we could have included in this amendment some of the recommendations of the Grace Commission and it would have brought down our deficit more than $225 billion that we are recommending over 3 years, but we thought that was not quite realistic so we did not trigger the Grace Commission recommendations.

Finally let me say that our proposal has military true growth of 5 percent. I serve on the Military Affairs Committee. I think that is enough. If we cut it more than that, I think it will hurt our posture as far as military is concerned.

COLA's are at CPI minus 2. That is across the board. It is fair to one and all.

We slow down domestic spending and we raise some taxes.

Let us be honest with ourselves, if we implement this amendment the deficit can be reduced by $225 billion over 3 years. It makes sense. It is workable. I certainly hope the Members will support the Roemer-Stenholm-Montgomery amendment.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. GLICKMAN).

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I was sponsor of the Jones-Campbell CPI minus 2 bill. I looked at this proposal. It is probably the best deficit reduction proposal I think we have got. I am not going to support it, but the fact of the matter is it has a downward trend on deficits, which is real positive, with a 3-year average of $162 billion for the deficits.

And it does dramatic things. But I had to ask myself, Mr. Chairman, since this budget is not self-executing, I had to pretend that it was. I have to vote for something that I think that I, in my judgment, and the rest of the House, are going to implement.

The fact of the matter is the first question is: Will the Congress really vote for these cost-of-living reductions in social security and other programs?

The answer is "No." When we actually get the legislation this year, an election year, we will not support the reductions.

So I find at least for myself that I cannot support this budget resolution because we are going to be back in the exact same position we were as last year's budget resolution, voting for tax increases that can never be effectuated.

The second thing is the freeze, the 3-year freeze on domestic discretionary spending. As my colleague from Massachusetts said, some things need to be frozen, some things do not. Today in the Agriculture Committee we approved an authorization for $225 million of new dollars to provide help so farmers will not tear up highly erodible land, a very serious national program.

And it is just as a practical matter around this place, there will be items that you are going to have to go up on and items that you go down on.

I guess when I come down to the entire situation I say to my colleague from Louisiana and others, that I have got to vote for a budget resolution that I think is going to be passed in this place. I have to vote for one that I think Members will support in appropriations bills. I have to vote for one that Members are going to support in tax bills.

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLICKMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. ROEMER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

There is no Member of the House I admire more in terms of courage and intelligence. It shocks me to have the gentleman not discern the following mystery. How can Members of Congress, individually and collectively, feel this is the best budget before them, but not have the courage to vote for it? Hiding behind the fact that Congress will not then have the courage to follow what they voted on. We need guys like you.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Thank you.

Let me comment on a couple of things. There are a couple of good budgets before us. This has in terms of a long term some very substantial proper deficit reduction measures. The cost-of-living reduction.

The fact of the matter is this year we have got a deficit crisis and I have to be in the judgment, the pragmatic judgment of trying to come up with a proposal that the rest of us are going to vote for.

I know what happens when Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI brings a social security bill to the floor with a 2-percent COLA reduction. It might get 100 votes at the most.

That is why I think in all honesty, regardless of what we think is best for the long-term purpose of this deficit reduction, the Jones proposal, the Budget Committee proposal, offers the most realistic chance to get passed by this House.

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. BARNARD).

Mr. BARNARD. Mr. Chairman, today I rise to support the 2-percent solution. It asks a minimum sacrifice across the board from all who can afford it, while preserving the safety net for those who cannot.

It allows a 5-percent real growth in military spending, and achieves economy without sacrificing security.

Simply put, it is the fairest, most even-handed of all the eight budgets considered here today.

The 2-percent solution cuts no entitlement benefits. Means-tested programs are fully funded. Other entitlements growth at the CPI rate minus 2 percentage points. Remaining domestic programs are frozen at 1984 levels and foreign aid is cut $2.8 billion per year.

On the revenue side, the 2-percent solution goes one step further than H.R. 4170. Tax indexing will proceed as scheduled, but at the CPI rate minus 2 percentage points. This small adjustment saves $22 billion.

The 2-percent solution does not rely on Grace Commission savings. All our numbers have been cleared and double checked by the Congressional Budget Office. There are no phony or double-counted numbers; there are no false and fleeting hopes.

The 2-percent solution does not ask for further sacrifices from our veterans. It only asks that those who benefit most from this great country share equally in getting it back on course.

The 2-percent solution saves $225 billion in 3 years. It is the fairest and best response to the threatening specter of $200 billion deficits.

Look at the major assumptions of this budget and tell me honestly who will feel pain.

Will it be the elderly widow in my district who waits anxiously for that monthly social security check?

No; her benefits will not be cut.

Will it be the veteran who relies on a pension check to make ends meet?

No; his benefits will not be cut.

Will it be the young mother, who struggles to support her family on AFDC payments and food stamps?

No; her benefits will not be cut, and she will get a full cost-of-living increase.

Will it be the security and safety of our Nation's defense?

No; 5 percent real growth still gives us a strong, stable force, ready and able to defend this country.

This budget is the best budget for America because it is the fairest and most equitable. But there is another reason it is best. It is also best because it will eventually make interest rates tumble.

If we achieved a $200 billion deficit reduction over 3 years—and I think with this budget we can—I would not be surprised to see interest rates come down sharply.

That translates into better days for the homebuilders all across America, and for the families who want to buy those homes.

It translates into better days for America automakers, who must compete with the threat of imports. It means good news for every man or woman whose business is affected by exports, and for every American whose job depends on exports.

The poultry farmers in Georgia and the autoworkers in Michigan share a stake in our country's future, and in our quest to keep interest rates low. Lower interest rates, a lower deficit—we can achieve them, if we adopt this budget.

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. SAM B. HALL, JR.)

Mr. SAM B. HALL, JR. Mr. Chairman, I would like to again, as others have done, thank the gentlemen from Louisiana (Mr. ROEMER), from Texas (Mr. STENHOLM), and Mississippi for bringing, I think, to us tonight the best budget reduction plan of the six or seven that will be offered.

Let me say at the outset that there is no way to approach this problem, and that is what it is, without stepping on the toes of some people who are the recipients of more Government than sometimes we are willing to pay for.

Everywhere I go in my district, people tell me, they demand, that something must be done about the deficit. They are asking us to do something that might help themselves and their children. What we are doing here with this resolution and this amendment is to affect those things that need to be affected.

I do not think anyone within the sound of my voice will make the proposition that the COLA's are equitable to all parties. We know—whether it be social security, military, civilian retirements, or whatever—that COLA's are going to bankrupt us to a certain degree. We know that they are not equal or equitable in every respect.

Now, just how do you approach something like that? Well, I think we are going to have to just really cinch up the girth, we are going to have to tighten the saddle, and we are going to have to hit that entitlement program like we have never done before. And you cannot do it—it cannot pass this body, it cannot be effective, in the long run—unless we do what this Roemer amendment says to do. I urge the Members to support it.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. PICKLE), the distinguished chairman of the Social Security Subcommittee.

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. ROEMER) is a proposal that speaks to a problem that we eventually must confront if we are ever going to get control over the budget or these deficits.

Specifically, he proposes to reduce the rate of growth in our entitlement programs.

In my opinion, the 2-percent proposal may be too severe but it ought to be understood by our membership that this entitlement issue should be considered and considered soon.

Moreover, there may be better ways to approach the entitlement issue than simply limiting cost-of-living increases.

Last year, this Congress voted for a 6-month delay on cost-of-living increases for social security recipients. That was no small sacrifice. It hurt a lot of people and those people were among the few groups that really had to make sacrifices in order to stabilize our social security trust funds. To their credit, they have accepted this delay in as good a grace as possible.

If we were to pass the 2-percent solution tonight, you would be asking these people to be cut again on top of the reduction we made last year. That seems to me to be unfair.

Moreover, the social security bill last year provided a stabilizing provision to require that future cost-of-living increases be based on the lesser of the increase in wages or the increase in prices if the trust fund reserves got below a certain point.

But our social security trust fund is not in trouble at this time. That stabilizing provision will not be triggered this year. There is no impending crisis in social security that requires us to make further cost-of-living reductions at this point. The trust fund is in balance and while we must constantly monitor the situation the current revenues and current COLA formula should be sufficient to maintain a balanced, stable system.

But it is not unfair to say that some reductions in entitlement programs must be considered, particularly in civilian and military retirement which constitute two of the biggest entitlement burdens on the general treasury. While this amendment would make reductions in several programs, it in fact hits social security recipients twice.

I have another concern about the gentleman's amendment although I admire him for offering this approach. It would be difficult to explain how we cut social security and civilian and military retirees while at the same time allowing defense spending to increase not only for inflation but with 5 percent real growth. That seems to be an imbalance to me.

But I do think the gentleman from Louisiana brings to our attention one aspect of the budget that must be looked at later on.

I think the American people must be told we will need to get into this area. It is my humble opinion that Congress will have hearings and discussions on the entitlement question. It is not unreasonable to think that we might make some progress if all programs and all recipients are treated the same.

I find that most people, whatever their interests, are willing to make sacrifices to reduce the deficit if we are all treated the same. We cannot have that feeling sufficiently when we tie in entitlements versus defense. But my friends, we must look at entitlements this fall or next year and I hope to be an active participant in these discussions.

I must say, however, that I cannot support this amendment but I think the gentleman is on the right track and I am sure we will hear more about this issue in the months and years ahead.

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PICKLE. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. ROEMER. I thank the gentleman for yielding. I thank him for his generous remarks and for his years of effort in this very area, and I look forward to working with him and others on this problem later in the year if we do not have the courage to tackle it tonight.

I thank the gentleman.

Mr. PICKLE. We will be working with the gentleman.

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CAMPBELL).

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this budget resolution because it does try to deal with the problem that we are facing and that we do not have the intestinal fortitude to deal with; that is, the structural deficit that we have in this country. We have two types of deficits. One is cyclical; one is structural. One is caused by the ups and downs of the economy; the other is built into our budgeting system.

When we indexed programs to inflation originally, we recognized the fact that we would have problems and, therefore, the law says that if inflation is under 3 percent, you do not get any increase in your COLA. Bear in mind that this says that it is CPI minus 2, and the law today says that if it is under 3 percent you get nothing.

So we have recognized this all along, that we were going to have problems. As a matter of fact, over the last 10 years CPI overpaid COLA's by some 22 percent above the erosion of the dollar during that same period of time, and it compounds, and we have paid for it. The chairman of the Budget Committee recognizes this and I recognize the same thing because we sponsored this legislation to deal with it.

This is the only honest way to try to deal with the problem.

And let me say to the rest of you that as far as speaking of social security, we put in a trigger mechanism for social security. Social security, if the trust fund drops in 1985, goes to the lower of wages or prices.

Now, we have already done that. And it changes in 1980. If the social security trust fund drops under 20 percent, it still triggers down.

If you had had the same provision of the lower of wages and prices over the last 10 years, you would have paid out some 24 percent less in COLA's, and you have done that to the people on social security already in law and you voted for it. And yet you are not willing to take this floor tonight and vote for the rest of the COLA's to do the same thing.

This is the most honest presentation that has come before us. There are no hidden figures in it. It is real. I do happen to think that the defense area of it is a little low, but I am going to support it anyhow because it deals with the structural problems of 40 percent of our budget. We only have control over 24 percent of this budget. The rest of it is automatic. Unless we face this problem, we are fooling the American people.

Mr. ROEMER. I just want the gentleman from South Carolina to know that even though I think the defense figures are a little high, I am going to support it, too.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentlewoman from New Jersey (Mrs. ROUKEMA).

Mrs. ROUKEMA. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to both the House Budget Committee's resolution and the Republican substitute. I do so out of deep concern for a credible plan for deficit reduction and our need to pass a budget that is balancing the needs of domestic and defense requirements in an equitable fashion.

The defense budget, I believe, is central to our discussion today. Our responsibility is twofold: First, to insure that the defenses of this Nation are strong enough to prevent aggression and keep the peace. Second, to insure that the American people's hard-earned tax dollars are spent wisely—that the military has an incentive to be more efficient, and that the deficits, which endanger our Nation, can be reduced.

Of the options before us—the substitute offered by Mr. ROEMER is most realistic in reducing the deficit.

I had intended to offer an amendment to provide for a real growth rate of 5 percent in defense spending. While my plan would have increased actual dollars spent on defense, it also would have been an incentive to set realistic defense priorities and consequently, enhance the value we derive from the recent growth in defense spending. Unfortunately, my appeal to offer a 5-percent amendment yesterday before the Rules Committee was denied. Fortunately, the Roemer substitute provides a vehicle.

In light of the increase already in place and the vast dollars committed, I feel we can accomplish with a 5-percent increase the same result that my colleagues who proposed a 7-percent increase are seeking. Five percent real growth alone may appear modest—but coming on the heels of 40-percent increases over the last 4 years, it should be fully enough to keep the momentum of defense improvement moving forward on a steady course.

A measured, steady spending of defense dollars—such as the 5-percent rate would accomplish the twin goals of keeping our defense strong and bringing down the deficit. We must deter aggression. But, to do so, we must require the Pentagon to set careful priorities, whereby we can bring balance into the budget process and set sensible targets for defense spending. I would like to remind my colleagues that last year after a protracted struggle this body saw fit to provide for a 5-percent real growth rate for defense.

It is clear from meeting with my constituents that one of the greatest concerns the American people have is the huge Federal deficit. In a recent poll I conducted throughout the Fifth District of New Jersey, citizens demanded by a wide margin that something be done about run away Federal spending, including defense spending. Right now, one out of every $5 the U.S. Government spends is a borrowed dollar. Deficit spending mortgages the future and is a sad legacy to leave our children. It is dangerous—dangerous to economic stability, a growing job market and imperils our national defense.

It is time to recognize that deficits threaten our national security as surely as any foreign adversary. For this reason, the 8.3-percent spending increase offered in the Republican substitute plan—$9.5 billion in fiscal year 1985—is simply too expensive for a nation already staring into the face of a staggering deficit.

I think we make a serious mistake if we fail to view the deficit as a danger to American security. In the words of the March 26, 1984 edition of Business Week.

> A great power that is unwilling to pay for its policies ends up as a country unable to preserve them. History shows that great powers, from the Roman Empire to the British Empire, have run aground when they have been unable to finance their commitments. Left unattended, budget deficits are putting this country in mortal danger.

Mr. Chairman, the record deficits which plague our economy and endanger the recovery cannot be talked out of existence. We cannot afford to give lip service to this serious issue.

Throughout the last 3 years, I have warned against the ticking time bomb of "defense entitlements." The explosion in defense expenditures for which the bills will come due throughout the coming decade, need to be checked. The biggest bills for weapons approved in 1981, 1982, and 1983 will not fall due until the second half of the decade and beyond. Giving budget authority is like planting a seed—the real growth comes later.

In its well-meaning effort to improve our defenses, Congress too often ignores the problem of uncontrollable future growth in defense spending. "Defense entitlement" means that, once new weapons systems are initiated, they take on a life of their own—just like many of the runaway "Great Society" programs created in an earlier decade but paid for by today's taxpayers. With gathering momentum, once set in motion, these elaborate, vastly expensive weapons programs face expenditures in future years.

As the weapon moves from drawing board to production line, installment payments from the Pentagon grow bigger and bigger. One need not be a defense expert to know that most major weapons systems end up costing considerably more than was anticipated during their research and development stages.

In fact, the Congressional Budget Office has estimated that current DOD weapons programs may be underfunded by as much as $69 billion over the next 5 years, even excluding inflation. Too often, the net effect is that Congress ends up throwing tax dollars at the problem without considering the economic ramifications—or without even applying sound military doctrine consistent with our global responsibilities.

When expensive weapons become seemingly entitled to funding, the result is not only an increase in the Nation's deficit, but encouragement of waste on the part of the Defense Department.

The procurement component of the defense budget has grown rapidly in recent years. Yet, does this mean America is defended in the best possible manner? The disturbing answer is no. Because, while Congress spends open-ended sums of money on certain elaborate weapons systems, the real heart of our military deterrence—operations and maintenance—is neglected.

Clearly, then, an 8.3-percent growth rate is too high. But what of the Democratic alternative—the House Budget Committee's proposed 3.5-percent figure? Unfortunately, it too is unrealistic.

Let me be clear on one point. President Reagan has played an essential leadership role, the first in many years, by drawing public attention to the long negected needs of our national security. He forcefully illustrated and spoke out about the neglect that existed in U.S. military preparedness in the past decade. In 1980 he pledged to the American people that he would close the window of vulnerability in our defenses. It is to the President's credit that he has been working hard to make good on that pledge.

I need not list all the potential harm a 3.5-percent funding level would cause, but suffice it to say the impact on reduced combat readiness of ships, planes, and personnel would be too serious to risk. At least one Army division might be deactivated; major shipbuilding programs could be halted; carrier task forces in the Indian Ocean and Mediterranean might have to be withdrawn—the list goes on and on.

How, then, do we keep faith with our pledge and desire for a Defense budget that will deter aggression and keep the peace we all cherish?

We do so by setting a budget authority level which will be high enough to give those who defend our Nation the tools they need to insure our security, yet reasonable enough to require the Defense Department to set careful priorities—and to contain the deficit.

I do not come to the floor of the House today to criticize or condemn the President's efforts to keep America strong, as some of my colleagues have done. The rebuilding of our defenses must continue. But, neither do I come here with the naive view that the Pentagon, in its rebuilding, need not concern itself with priorities. If, for example, the cost-saving ideas of the Grace Commission are ever to see the light of day—if better defense management and waste reduction are to happen—we will need to send a signal loud and clear.

The administration recommendations, even as amended, are simply too high. The Budget Committee's are too low. Members who care equally about easing the deficit, persuading the Pentagon to use good judgment and keeping America strong have a chance to vote for a compromise—the Roemer budget substitute.

Members may not agree with every portion of the Roemer budget substitute. As a past supporter of income tax indexing, I oppose the 2-percent reduction in indexing assumption. However, I strongly believe that the Roemer substitute gives this body the opportunity to focus on a fundamental purpose—solid, credible savings, and deficit reductions through realistic defense spending targets.

Mr. Chairman, we should not have to choose between too much defense spending and too little. Fortunately, we have a suitable plan before us today through which we can equally meet our dual obligations: To protect our citizens and use their tax dollars wisely and well.

Having intended to offer a 5-percent growth rate for defense myself, I urge my colleagues to steer clear of a 3.5-percent growth rate too low for safety and a 8.3-percent rate too high for us to afford. My colleagues may be as interested to find out as I was that 8.3 percent is the real growth figure for defense in the Republican alternative as computed by CBO.

Mr. Chairman, there is a sensible middle course. We should take that course today. Support the Roemer substitute.

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. BARTLETT).

Mr. BARTLETT. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, you have read and heard of the details. This gentleman would just say that if there is an opportunity to make a significant reduction in the deficit this year and tonight and for in the future, this is the budget. This is the one that we can vote for that can pass; it is not anyone's first choice, I understand that. The gentleman from California has had a first choice; the gentleman from Ohio has had a first choice; I have other choices, but this is a budget in which the Members of this Congress can get together and can find a way to reduce the deficit for now and in the future.

One Member who said he was going to vote against it, said that this is the best deficit reduction plan that is available, and I hope he changes his mind, because if it is the best available, then we ought to be voting for it.

No; maybe it is not everyone's first choice, but it is a darn good second choice, and it is a second choice that can make a difference, and that is what we all ought to be here for tonight.

Deficits do matter; the gentleman from Louisiana has said that, that is the way to reduce those deficits.

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, we have but two speakers left. I yield 30 seconds to the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. BEREUTER).

Mr. BEREUTER. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Roemer substitute. As I believe the comments of myself and the gentlewoman from New Jersey will make it quite clear, this is not a regional substitute in any way. It was admitted a few minutes ago by an opponent to this proposal that this is the best budget deficit reduction proposal before this House.

Indeed it is. It is very disappointing and discouraging to hear people in this House suggest that they are not going to support this particular proposal because the House will not have the courage to implement it.

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as she may consume to the gentlewoman from Tennessee (Mrs. LLOYD).

Mrs. LLOYD. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Chairman, I certainly am going to support Mr. ROEMER on his amendment, and his proposal. I think this is an excellent opportunity for Members of this body on both sides of the aisle to rise to their responsibility.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Texas (Mr. PICKLE) pointed out the major flaw in this substitute. That is that it does not fairly distribute all the deficit reduction sacrifices.

The gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. ROEMER) said we are asking something from everyone. But the fact is this particular substitute does not ask anything from the present current policy of defense spending. Current policy in defense is a 5-percent real growth. Five-percent growth after adjusting for inflation. This substitute does not diminish that or reduce that growth path of spending of defense by any amount. That is the major flaw in the substitute.

I think it is also important, however, to point out again in the hope that Members of this body will know what they are voting on and will be willing to vote next week on what they say they are voting tonight. This particular substitute would not accommodate the administration's supplemental request for Central America; it would not accommodate the food for peace nor the disability insurance amendments which have already passed this House. I think the Members ought to know that.

I want to dwell particularly on the entitlement indexing reform of the substitute. Quite frankly, I think this proposal is an idea whose time will come, although I doubt seriously it is going to come in 1984.

A number of us offered a proposal similar to this, a CPI minus 2 percent across the board. Immediately the White House sent signals that they would not support it; the Speaker has said that he would not support it; there is strong opposition to it; it is not likely to override a Presidential veto even if it were to get to the White House.

Let us just understand what we are talking about. Eventually something has to be done about indexing on both the spending side and the tax side, and that is basically what is called for here. But these are real bullets, and let us make no mistake about it: Members who vote for this this week, will be asked next week to vote for a reconciliation package that reduces indexing of taxation by 2 percent below CPI which will have savings that will be effective immediately in January 1985. Members will be asked to reduce the cost-of-living adjustments on social security, civilian and military retirement, railroad retirement, and Federal employee workers' compensation programs to 2 percent below CPI.

The total savings will be about $25 billion over the next 3 years. But next week that vote will occur. Now, those who show courage tonight, I hope will show the same courage next week. I only point this out because I think it is terribly important as we go through every substitute that we know what we are voting on and we are committed to vote that way on appropriation bills, reconciliation bills, and those other implementing legislation in the future.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma, I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The point the gentleman made I want to ask him again.

If it is a CPI minus 2 percent, it applies across the board?

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. That is correct.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Both the income and the outlay, so it does not hit anyone disproportionately; it is fair and equal to everybody?

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. That is correct.

Mr. CAMPBELL. And they would have to vote on that for everybody?

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. That is right. This would be a part of a reconciliation bill which would be before the House of Representatives next week and would take all of the COLA's on the entitlement spending programs. Social security and all the others, reduce it to a CPI minus 2 percent, and it would take indexing of taxation and reduce that to a CPI minus 2 percent.

We will accomplish that all next week if this substitute passes this week.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. DONNELLY).

Mr. DONNELLY. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Chairman, let me just reiterate what I think is the fundamental flaw in the Roemer-Stenholm-Montgomery approach, at least in regards to entitlements. That flaw is simply this: Although on face value it seems as if it is fair, that we are reducing all entitlements 2 percent across the board, the system presently is innately unfair. Not all annuitants, whether they be social security, military retirees, civilian retirees, railroad pensioners, receive the same annual cash annuity.

When you reduce all across the board, when the bottom line comes when they receive that check on a monthly basis, not everybody is going to pay the same penalty, the 2 percent across the board would make them pay.

That is the fundamental flaw. If there was a threshold, if there was protection for those lowest annuitants, those minimally under $10,000, I think there is some validity in the argument. I think there is some validity in much of this argument. I just do not think this is the way to approach the problem.

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONNELLY. I would be glad to yield to my friend, the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. ROEMER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is correct in saying that if we had a threshold or lifeline concept across all entitlements, we could be more fair. But I know the gentleman will not change social security into a welfare program. I know the gentleman has not changed or attempted to change a single law to take non-means-tested entitlements and make them based on income.

If the gentleman is willing to do that, we will have a threshold lifeline, and I will join him then in a differentiated COLA cut. But until then, this is the best that can be done.

Mr. DONNELLY. I do not think the argument ought to be because nothing has been done to this point we ought to take this, what I consider to be, somewhat reactionary approach. I think it is going to take a bipartisan effort on both sides of the aisle on people of all different philosophical and political beliefs to get to the root of what is going to be a major problem in terms of fiscal policy, and that is getting a handle on the entitlement programs.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, in closing, again as I said about the previous substitute, I commend the authors of this substitute. I think it is serious. It is real. That has been pointed out. It certainly is real.

I just hope that Members who vote for this substitute, as in any substitute, are prepared to vote the same way next week, next month, and what have you.

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. DARDEN).

Mr. Chairman, I yield myself the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. ROEMER) is recognized for 4½ minutes.

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, I thank our colleagues who have joined with us tonight for the quality and quantity of their debate tonight on an important issue.

I agree with those who said that this budget is not perfect, because it is not. But I disagree with those who said that we lack either the wisdom or the courage to do the inevitable beginning now.

The interesting thing about entitlement discipline is that a little action early pays large dividends down the road. The size of the deficits facing your mother and father and your family are terrifying. Do you not love to hear economists, whether they be supply-siders or old Keynesians, talk about the fact that "We can survive these deficits." How do they know? America has never had these kinds of deficits before. It is like listening to generals when they talk about atomic warfare. How do they know? They were never in one.

The same thing on these deficits, and I know this: $200 billion a year for as far as you can see will eat every social program alive, will turn every highway program into a desert, will affect every domestic spending program you hold dear.

Vote for a budget that is real. Vote for a budget that is fair, one that does raise taxes, and I do not like it, one that does cut military, but unlike some would say, it does not gut it, it just cuts it. Vote for one that takes domestic spending, nondefense, and for 3 years has a soft freeze. It allows the entitlements to go up. It allows all health programs to go up. It takes all mandatory increased spending for the next 3 years that is current law and funds it.

In every function, the dollar values go up year by year. This is fair approach. There will not be any budget on the floor tonight or tomorrow that asks of every American, give your fair share, and you know what they will get in return? They might not get the biggest check in the mail, but they will get an America that is growing. They will get an America that provides jobs for themselves and their children. They will get a decent national defense, and they will get a tax burden they can afford to pay.

Mr. KEMP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROEMER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEMP. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman suggests it is a tax increase, and he is right, but the problem is that it is not across the board. If you are in the 50-percent bracket, and a wealthy American, this will not affect you. This will affect you if you are under the 50-percent bracket, where 80 percent of the American people are.

So, in effect, by reducing the indexing even 2 percent, we are raising taxes on the working men and women of this country who are under the 50-percent bracket, so it is not across the board.

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, let me reclaim my time. I did not offer the time to the gentleman for a speech. I have heard his speeches before.

What I offered you was a chance to say that no budget is easy, and you cannot get the spending cuts we want without coming up to the tax table. Now, if you can figure out a better way, offer it. I have not seen it yet. I have not seen it yet, and I am open to it.

I admit to the gentleman, I do not like to change indexing one smidgen.

Mr. KEMP. That says it all.

Mr. ROEMER. But I do not see a choice.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROEMER. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I certainly do not like to change indexing either, but I would not take the floor of this House and propose to freeze or cut any outlays that are based on indexing unless I applied the same formula fairly to the income that we are also indexing. That is what makes this budget fair.

Mr. ROEMER. I will have a final comment and say do not fool yourself. The American people know. Ask back home. Think if you can survive this week by doing nothing. If you have to move, this is the way to go. Join with us.

The CHAIRMAN. All time on this amendment has expired.

The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. ROEMER).

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 59, noes 338, not voting 35, as follows:

The Clerk announced the following pair:

On this vote:

Mr. Ray for, with Mr. Mitchell against.

So the amendment in the nature of a substitute was rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. FOLEY) having assumed the chair, Mr. MOAKLEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 280) revising the congressional budget for the U.S. Government for the fiscal year 1984 and setting forth the congressional budget for the U.S. Government for the fiscal years 1985, 1986, and 1987, had come to no resolution thereon.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks and to include extraneous material on the concurrent resolution just considered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION FOR SUBCOMMITTEE ON RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT AND SUBCOMMITTEE ON PROCUREMENT AND MILITARY NUCLEAR SYSTEMS OF COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES TO SIT ON TOMORROW, APRIL 5, 1984, DURING PROCEEDINGS UNDER THE 5-MINUTE RULE

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Subcommittee on Research and Development and the Subcommittee on Procurement and Military Nuclear Systems of the Committee on Armed Services be permitted to sit tomorrow, April 5, 1984, during proceedings under the 5-minute rule, for markup of the Defense authorization bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may be permitted to extend their remarks and to include extraneous material on House Resolution 476, the rule providing for consideration of the first budget resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

A HISTORIC DAY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. GINGRICH) is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I wanted to take a little time this evening to review what has happened today on the budget and in particular I think on the extraordinary experience during the Humphrey-Hawkins debate, which historically was a highlight of the liberal democratic dialog. Today I think for the first time in American history we actually had more Republicans on the floor talking about the economy, talking about the importance of jobs, talking about the importance of take-home pay and a real standard of living for working Americans than there were Democrats, and I suspect that not since the 1920's have we seen the Democratic Party in such disarray about the economy and the Republican Party so willing to talk about a better future and to talk about the prospects of a better working America.

In that sense, I think we are seeing a historic change in the role of the two parties. What is happening, I think, is very important. The liberal Democrats are in the process of running out of issues. They find it is a little difficult to complain about the 4½ million jobs that have been created since the trough of the depression. They find it is a little difficult to talk about the economic indicators that show American working people have more confidence and are doing more work. The productivity is way up. The capital investment is improving and we are creating more and more jobs.

So they grasp around desperately looking for new slogans for new tunes to cry "wolf" and to hunt for what I think is the classic problem of the liberal welfare state, which is to focus on problems and to seek victims.

And it was interesting to me that on an afternoon when, frankly, everyone who is familiar with what is happening in America should have been positive during the Humphrey-Hawkins debate. We have a Nation which has in the last 2 years created more jobs than Europe has created in the last decade. We have a Nation which is booming once again with vitality and excitement and opportunity and instead of saying it is not wonderful that we have recovered from the Carter-Mondale disaster, is it not wonderful we have recovered from the economic pain of high inflation, rising taxes, rising unemployment left us by the Carter-Mondale administration, it is a little difficult for our liberal democratic friends to reflect on what their candidate for President gave this country as part of his administration's legacy. As a consequence, they cannot really have the debate that we should have had, a debate which said, "All right, we have now had 3 years of an effort to create an opportunity society. We have had 3 years of an effort to increase take-home pay, 3 years of an effort to fight inflation."

What are the results? None of the democratic friends can talk about that because the fact is that the results have been very, very good indeed.

In this setting the liberal democratic leadership had an obvious problem since they really could not talk in a straightforward way about the tremendous increase in jobs, an increase which, for example, in January and February was rising by an average of 475,000 new jobs a month. They could not really talk about the rise in take-home pay which has given American workers for the first time since the 1960's an increase in the amount of money they could spend.

They really had nothing they could say that made any sense to the folks back home who for the first time in 15 years think things are going in the right direction. And so they tried to bring out President Reagan's budget from January.

Now, a number of us have been suggesting the liberal Democrats are behind the times, although we did not really have the courage to suggest that they were 2 months behind recent events, that there has been a lot of negotiations in between, that it has been on page 1, that there is a lot of evidence that the Reagan administration has worked with its allies in the Congress.

But why did they try to bring out the President's budget? They wanted to embarrass the Republicans. They were looking for a cheap political trick because, frankly, liberal Democrats have no real answers.

Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEMP. I was watching the debate and the gentleman was making some of the points in the debate today on the floor, as he is making here tonight, and I appreciate it because I could not be on the floor at the exact moment at which he was suggesting that maybe the majority leader would have liked to have brought up his budget, or Mr. Mondale or Mr. HART would like to bring up their budget, whatever it might be.

The gentleman was eloquent. He is usually eloquent, but he was more than eloquent today in challenging the idea that the Democratic majority party even has a budget that is anywhere near what is being supported out there on the stump by Mr. Mondale and Mr. HART and Mr. Jackson, all three of whom want an across-the-board surtax on the income of the American people, surtaxes on the wealthy, surtaxes on corporations, an ending to indexing, an ending to the third year of the tax cut of President Reagan.

All three of them, including the majority leader, would raise taxes across the board on the American working man and woman and on labor and on capital.

Very frankly, the gentleman from Georgia, probably better than anyone else, helped identify the utter counterproductivity of a challenge by the majority leader to vote for the President's budget. I happened to vote for it, but I think this whole process today has been a sham.

The emperor has no clothes. We are not going to impact the market by what is being done out here on paper. The only way to impact the market is what we do on reconciliation, on taxes, on spending, and on monetary policy.

The gentleman deserves a lot of credit for helping put in their place those who were afraid to talk about what HART and Mondale and Jackson and WRIGHT want to do to the American people.

Mr. GINGRICH. The gentleman from New York, as I mentioned during the Humphrey-Hawkins debate, more than any other single Member of this House, to use Mr. Mondale's earlier line, has moved the beef to the Republican side.

The development over the last 5 or 6 years, after a new approach, supply side approach to encouraging incentive and growth and opportunity and job creation, has frankly begun to shame the liberal Democrats.

I was delighted to see—I think the gentleman was not on the floor—but the very distinguished majority leader got up, a classic liberal Democrat in the most eloquent terms from his Texas background, got up and said that one of the major causes of the budget deficit was we had a recession, and the recession took people out of work, and they did not pay taxes, and it put them on unemployment.

I felt certain that had the gentleman from Buffalo been here he would have been delighted to learn after those 6 years of preaching that the distinguished majority leader, Mr. WRIGHT, had learned the lesson.

Mr. KEMP. One other point. I remember listening to the majority leader talk about how interest rates went up so high as to cause a collapse in the housing market, in the auto industry, in steel and agriculture, and what impact that had on unemployment. And, of course, he used to say every 1-percent increase in unemployment drives the deficit up by $40 billion or so.

The gentleman from Georgia has well pointed out that this is an interest rate recession, this is a monetary recession, and the combination of cutting the spending and lowering the taxes is the way out of it, not to go back to the old methods of 1978 and 1979 for which we all are so grateful we are away from.

Mr. GINGRICH. The amazing thing is I would hasten to add that there is a very good reason the liberal Democrats, although they did use the gentleman from Colorado (Mr. WIRTH) were not willing to bring up the gentleman from Colorado, Mr. HART's tax plan, nor were they able or willing to bring up the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. Mondale's plan, and the reason is simple: They would raise taxes so dramatically, either Mondale or HART or Jackson, any of the three would raise taxes so dramatically that we would enter a period of economic decay worse than Jimmy Carter. We would look back on Jimmy Carter as the good Democrat, if in fact we had a chance to pass the Mondale or the Hart or the Jackson tax increases.

As I mentioned earlier tonight, let me just repeat, Mr. Mondale would increase taxes, if you take his program, by about $231 billion between 1985 and 1999, $231 billion in tax increases, of which approximately $160 billion would be paid by individual Americans.

By contrast, Mr. HART is even more liberal. Mr. HART's new ideas are very old ideas. He would raise $300 billion in taxes between fiscal years 1985 and 1989, and about $200 billion in those taxes would be paid by individuals. That is, Mr. HART would raise taxes on the average American by almost $1,000 per American or $4,000 per family of four over that 4-year period.

Now, I can well understand why the liberal Democratic leadership did not want to trot out the budgets of their Presidential candidates, because the fact is that those budgets, if they were seen by the American people, would lead to an even more dramatic collapse of the liberal Democratic campaign for the Presidency.

One of the targets for both Mr. Mondale and Mr. HART is indexing and yet indexing is one of the key defenses of working Americans against inflation. I have seen one study of the Mondale indexing figures which suggests that Mr. Mondale assumes that we will have 10-percent inflation if he is President, so that his indexing numbers only makes sense if you assume that Americans are getting 10-percent paper increases because of the inflation rate pushing them into higher brackets.

Mr. WALKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding. I think the gentleman made an interesting point about the comments of the majority leader earlier this evening. And the majority leader at that point was responding to a question of mine as to why he had been $58 billion wrong when he had presented the fiscal 1981 budget to the House. And he was explaining that because this recession came along that that was the problem.

He did not want to yield to me any further when I asked him to yield because the fact is that their budget had something to do with the fact we had a recession. It was their phony budgeting. It was the fact that they had massive revenue increases in that budget that led to the recession.

So, in fact, he was one of the people who caused the recession that he then blames for the fact that somehow he made a $58 billion mistake when he was out here on the House floor defending the budget.

And I think, again, it shows that this process has been a sham for some time and the American people are beginning to recognize it is a sham, and it is about time that we go to honest budgeting.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. GINGRICH. I want to comment further, that I was very impressed when the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. HILER) came out and had copies of the headlines of the major newspapers in 1980 reporting on the collapse of the American system under the Carter-Mondale regime. It was interesting that when Carter-Mondale were running this country we had dramatically increasing interest rates, we had a tremendous runaway inflation and literally the American job environment was collapsing for working Americans.

I yield to my good friend, the gentleman from California (Mr. HUNTER).

Mr. HUNTER. I appreciate the gentleman yielding.

I just came over from my office because I saw a very unusual sight here on the House floor. I saw Members of Congress talking about jobs and about the 4 million plus jobs that have been created in the last year or so, a subject that we have not heard very much about.

I heard the gentleman who believes in the rising tide, Mr. KEMP from New York, talking about the fact that the American people are putting this economy back on track, the deficit is going down and I would like to ask the gentleman, the gentleman from Georgia, he could tell us, I heard some very interesting statistics in that he gave the statistics for the jobs rate in the first several months of 1984 and the rate of jobs that are being created under the program that Republicans put through this Congress in 1981 and 1982.

He could tell us again, was that something like 750,000 jobs per month?

Mr. GINGRICH. No; it was actually about 475,000 jobs in January and again in February and I believe again in March, although I have not seen the March figures. It is about 4.9 million jobs, 4,900,000 since the recession reached its bottom.

I yield to the gentleman from Florida (Mr. MACK).

Mr. MACK. I thank the gentleman.

The report for the month of February showed a two-tenths of 1 percent decline which put 700,000 people on the payroll.

Mr. GINGRICH. Decline in unemployment, is that what the gentleman is saying?

Mr. MACK. Right.

Mr. GINGRICH. So there were 700,000 additional jobs. Then I stand corrected, the numbers I had were too modest and too cautionary.

The thing that fascinates me is that here is the private American economy out there working; auto workers once again in my own neighborhood; very close to my district in Lakewood, the Chevrolet plant has reopened and 1,500 workers have gone back to work without a single dime in Federal Government spending.

I see the Ford plant in my district in Hayfield putting a second shift on, another 1,000 people going back to work. I see the housing industry recovering. Do we have any word from all of our friends who are so worried about jobs? Does a single liberal Democrat get up and say that it is wonderful that each month this year we are adding the equivalent of the entire Federal jobs program to the private economy? And yet none of them say anything because they are not interested in jobs, they are interested in power.

If they create the jobs through the Government programs, they decide, through patronage, who gets the jobs and they have real power. But if the private system creates the jobs, if individual Americans create real companies, somehow that is not good enough for our liberal Democratic friends.

I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from California (Mr. HUNTER).

Mr. HUNTER. I appreciate the gentleman yielding and giving us these very important statistics.

And I think we are seeing a phenomenon in American politics because we are seeing the Republican Party begin to be the party that stands for people, for jobs, for productivity, and we have the Democratic Party running around, nibbling away at the President of the United States, not acknowledging the accomplishments that have been made in the last year, but really being the party of negativism, the party that does not believe in the inherent ability of the American people to produce.

I think the facts are that it is really not Ronald Reagan who is creating 4.9 million new jobs, it is not Ronald Reagan who is creating an increased dollar for the average American family, and increased paycheck in real terms, it is the American people. What we did in the last several years has allowed our people to unleash their creative abilities, their productive abilities, and to get out and make America great again.

I think again we are seeing a dramatic change, perhaps a change that is just as dramatic as in the 1930's when the American people rallied behind F.D.R. and went in droves to the Democratic Party because they perceived opportunity and hope in that party. I think the American people are seeing those qualities in the Republican Party.

Mr. GINGRICH. I thank the gentleman from California.

I think he made a point that we frankly do not say often enough.

I think that the American people have been liberated by Ronald Reagan and by the work we have done in this Congress in the last few years, despite the liberal Democrats, in that the American people are creating jobs. And I think the big difference has been that if you are a young American looking ahead and you think back to the Carter-Mondale years and you think back to what Mondale did for you as Vice President, the way jobs were collapsing, the way industries were dying, the way that there was no hope for the future, in the way that the malaise speech became a self-description of the liberal Democratic process of governing.

And then you look at a party, the Republican Party which is beginning to develop an approach which allows you to have a hope for the future, that we want to cut your taxes so that you can afford to save and buy a house, we want to keep down the inflation rate so you can afford to buy a car, we want to create an opportunity where you can go out some day and not just work for somebody else, you could actually go out and create a company, create new jobs and be the Henry Ford or the Thomas Edison of the next generation.

We are looking at this future. I understand why our liberal Democratic friends have a hard time wrestling with this, because what role is there for them? If they are not going to, as liberal Democrats, raise taxes and create new Government programs, if in fact the American people are going to create jobs and retrain themselves and be out there actively and dynamically creating a healthy environment, then maybe there are no victims left for the liberal welfare state to take care of.

All of a sudden, as we found today, and I think literally I go back because it was historically such a key moment in American history that for the first time every I walked on this floor and we had eight or nine Members on the Republican side eager to talk about the economy, about jobs, about hope and about opportunity, and we only had two stalwarts of the old guard left in the liberal Democratic side willing to hold the fort.

I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding

The gentleman from California (Mr. HUNTER) mentioned the fact that back in the 1930's the Democratic Party found adherents in people who thought they had more hope in the Democratic Party than they had in the Republican Party, given the circumstances at the time. And that produced the New Deal, which the liberal welfare state pointed to forever after saying, "Here is the example of all we can do for the country." They point to the number of jobs created during that period of time and tell us that that is the example by which we are to govern for the future.

I think it is interesting to look at another statistic: Since we have been talking about jobs here, that is in the last year we have created more jobs under the Reagan program and under the process of the American people going out and creating jobs for themselves, we have created more jobs that way than the New Deal created in the first 3 years of its existence.

So if the New Deal is the model by which we set our standards in the past, and right up until the present, I would say we have just developed a new model which is far better than the New Deal and is one that we ought to take a look at for the future.

Mr. GINGRICH. I think the gentleman is right. I think I have to make a point here: People work in order to have a better life, people work in order to be able to buy a car, in order to be able to go to school, in order to be able to have a nice vacation. What Mondale and HART's tax proposals mean is that even if you still have a job when they are done crushing the economy, you will not have take-home pay; if you raise taxes as Mr. Mondale suggests by $231 billion, over $1,000 per American, you simply are not going to be able to go out and buy a car and then your brother is not going to be able to work at that local auto plant and then you are going to have the economy collapsing within a very few years in the liberal Democratic program, and Mr. HART, as I said is even worse. However liberal you think Mondale is, Mr. HART would raise more money out of working Americans by a big factor. He would have a tax increase almost 40 percent bigger than Walter Mondale, which is kind of hard to believe.

I would be delighted to yield to the gentleman from New York (Mr. KEMP).

Mr. KEMP. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I was watching the debate the other night, in New York, and they came to the point where Mr. Mondale criticized Mr. HART for not voting for the windfall profits tax proposed by Mr. Carter and Mr. Mondale back when he was Vice President.

GARY HART said the reason he did not vote for the Carter-Mondale windfall profit tax is it was not high enough. He wanted a 100-percent tax.

Now, 100-percent tax on the profits? I do not care if it is the profits of any company, much less energy, how are you going to get energy out of the ground? How are you going to get new jobs? How are you going to get growth? How are you going to get anything when you have a candidate for President advocating a 100-percent tax? I submit to you that the revenue from 100-percent tax would be zero.

Mr. GINGRICH. The gentleman from New York does not understand. Mr. HART is a man, liberal enough to make malaise a reality. He did not want it just to stay a speech, he would guarantee with 100-percent tax on oil that in fact we would end up having a dramatic shortage of oil and we would today be paying $2.50 a gallon for the gasoline we bought.

Mr. HUNTER. If the gentleman would yield, would the gentleman go briefly over the inflation figures that we have seen over the last year or so, because one thing that we have heard from the Democrat side of the aisle was even if the economy does improve, if it gets strong, we are going to see incredible ravaging inflation come back immediately. It is going to be a hot economy, but it is going to be an economy with inflation.

I know we heard that from a number of economists. I think that led Murry Weidenbaum to say that if you took all the economists in the world and laid them end to end, it would not be a bad thing.

I wonder if the gentleman could tell us approximately what the annual rate of inflation has been during this recovery that has produced the 4.9 million jobs.

Mr. GINGRICH. Well, I think it is very important to recognize—I happen to have here a chart which is too small, I think, for the gentleman to see from that far away—there is a chart here on monthly data, Consumer Price Index. It is fascinating, because the chart only goes up to about 15 percent. There is this mountain peak. You climb straight up it, starting with the election of Jimmy Carter and you go right up to Mount Everest of inflation, which you reach in 1980. Then you come right down this steep side, which is the Ronald Reagan contribution to solid money, and you end up at around almost, we have down at the very bottom of this period, to barely above 2 percent inflation.

Now, any liberal Democrat who belongs to a party who under the Carter-Mondale administration gave us almost 15 percent a year—and if you remember, when Reagan took over, thanks to Mondale and HART and other liberal Democrats, we were at I believe 18 percent inflation the first quarter of 1981. And at 18 percent inflation any liberal Democrat who gets up in here and tells us they are worried, frankly is a little bit like your local bartender telling you that he worries about people drinking too much, while he offers drinks on the house to everybody.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. We may remember that back in those days, early in 1981, when we were trying to explain some of these things, we were being told by many of these same people who come to the floor now and want to give us economic prescriptions for the future that we had no hope of getting inflation below double-digit levels in the next decade, that we were going to have double-digit inflation for at least the next decade. As a matter of fact, when the gentleman from New York (Mr. KEMP) was out explaining what was going to happen with the tax cuts that he was asking us to put in place, we were being told at that time that you cannot enact this kind of tax cuts because what it was going to do was it was going to set inflation off and we would go right back to 20 or 25 percent inflation. It was going to absolutely wreck the economy.

Well, these people have been wrong. On every occasion they have been wrong. They have never been right. In the whole time I have been in the Congress, they have not been right yet. It is about time that people stopped listening to them.

Mr. GINGRICH. Frankly, if the liberal Democrats were doctors, they would probably lose their license to practice based on this.

Mr. MACK. If the gentleman will yield, I think that the last point that was brought up about inflation is an interesting one. We saw today three different alternatives that were presented. I really understand the gentleman from Louisiana in his approach. When you look at the budget the first thing that you do when you start going through the numbers is you try to find each little area that you can cut, that you can reduce the spending.

But when you start to ask the question what drives the spending in so many areas of our budget, the answer that you get is that it is inflation.

Now, what I am raising is instead of trying to figure out the formula for reducing spending by the CPI minus 2 or 3 percent, should we not be asking the question: How do we really impact inflation? Is there not another way to go about it besides saying to each American that they have got to give up a little bit more?

Mr. GINGRICH. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEMP. I was just listening to the colloquy between the gentleman from Georgia and the gentleman from Florida and also the kind remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania and our friend from Florida made a very key point which is that the very best way to lower the cost of entitlements, the very best most progressive, most positive, most compassionate reform of entitlement programs is to keep inflation down and put this Nation to work, which broadens the tax base and builds up the trust fund of all of the social security type entitlements that we have.

So, clearly, keeping inflation down and a growing economy is the key to bringing down the cost of entitlements and building up the trust fund.

But I was struck by the statement by our friend from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER) when he said how far the critics of our tax cut were off base. The Washington Post editorial page is on record as saying that tax cut cause inflation, tax cuts cause recession, tax cuts are causing the recovery, and they will then cause the recession in 1985. They have got deficits causing inflation, recession, recovery, and recession again. It is clear that the American people are a lot smarter than the economists who should be laid out end to end on the editorial pages of our major newspapers—other than the Wall Street Journal.

Mr. MACK. I wonder if the gentleman would just go on a bit further with the concept of monetary reform, some of the things that we can be taking a look at because I just do not feel that the impression that we have made so far, the same critics are out there today saying, "Oh wait a minute, you can't touch monetary reform. You can't touch the Federal Reserve. You can't tell them what to do."

Mr. KEMP. If the gentleman would continue to yield, just to say very quickly, article 1, section 8 of the Constitution of the United States says Congress has the constitutional authority to regulate the value of the currency. And I think it is a moral issue in this country, an issue of honesty and integrity in Government that once again the Congress, in conjunction with the administration and with the Federal Reserve Board, guarantee the purchasing power of the dollars in the pockets and in the savings accounts of the American people.

We had it ever since Alexander Hamilton. From Alexander Hamilton until 1971, this country operated for 95 percent of the time on the predicate that the dollar was going to be backed by something of value. It was going to be a fiduciary responsibility of the Government to guarantee the value of the currency: that it will not fall or will not rise, it will be stable. Interest rates were never higher than 4 or 5 percent for almost 200 years because the dollar was as good as gold.

John F. Kennedy, I said today on the floor of the House, pledged to the people of the world that he would protect the value of the currency. He said he would keep the dollar as good as gold. He called that the linchpin of the world trade and financial system. And it was.

We all know what interest rates were in the good old days, 4 percent interest rates, housing, autos, consumer loans, the opportunity to build the dream that the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. GINGRICH) talked about so eloquently.

Very frankly, I think this Congress has an obligation to tell the Federal Open Market Committee of the Federal Reserve Board that we think interest rates are too high, they are artificially too high, that growth is not bad for the economy, that inflation is not caused by too many men and women working, and that we expect from them the protection of the value of our currency, that it will be predictable over a long period of time, so that we can get this country back to work and make our dollar and our industry more competitive in the world market. That is my idea of an industrial policy for America.

Mr. MACK. I thank the gentleman for his remarks.

Mr. GINGRICH. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. MCEWEN).

Mr. MCEWEN. I think before we conclude this debate this evening that we should also emphasize the good motives that were behind the efforts to increase taxes in the latter part of the 1970's.

Right now there is a thrust on to solve our problems economically by increasing taxes. In 1977 the economy in this country was growing at 5½ percent, creating new jobs. And this Congress embarked upon a program of taxing "oil companies" by adding $55 billion to the tax burden of the American people. And every time a person pulled into the gasoline station, they contibuted an additional amount to the tax revenue of the United States of America.

We can track the decline of the growth in the economy, the increase in unemployment and the progress to the total depths of 1980 with a 2½-percent decline in the economy directly to the tax policies of 1978 and 1979.

Now having frozen the tax increase, having allowed dollars to flow back through the private economy, to create new jobs that increase real productivity, that put people to work permanently, we have the progress that we have seen over these last 18 months.

Absolutely, history has proven and economic policy reveals that if we are to attempt to follow that course again in the early 1980's, as we did in the latter 1970's, the same result will ensue; that is, that increased taxes will bring decreased revenue, decreased growth, and decreased hope. It is only as the economy is allowed to stimulate and grow through private-sector initiatives, through men and women purchasing and buying, building and creating in the private economy, that we will have the increased revenues to do all of the things that the liberal Democrats wish to pursue.

So at this moment I think that in this debate we need to constantly emphasize, because there are those who in a primary sense believe that an initial tax increase will somehow bring increased revenues.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from Ohio makes a very important point. I want to carry it a step further. Even for our friends who are concerned about the deficit, who want to raise taxes, it should chill them to the bone that in the New York debate, despite the fact that Mr. HART wants to raise taxes by $300 billion and Mr. Mondale wants to raise taxes by some $231 billion and Mr. Jackson also wants to raise taxes, every single one of the liberal Democratic candidates is opposed to a constitutional amendment to require a balanced budget.

Now, what they are saying is not only do they want to take the money out of your pocketbook so you cannot spend it, they are not even going to balance the budget when they raise your taxes by $1,000 per person. So you are going to end up over the next 4 or 5 years, if Mr. HART or Mr. Mondale or Mr. Jackson have their way, and if the liberal Democrats in this House were to have their way, paying $1,000 more per American in taxes, and you still would not balance the budget because they would raise spending even more.

I want to carry this a step further. Because the liberal Democrats who run this House knew they could not come out in the open with the size of their tax increase program and with the proposals of their Presidential candidates, they used every gimmick they could. They run this House. When they want to, the liberal Democrats have absolute control. They showed this the other week when they brought a bill to the floor that was written on Monday, carried to the Rules Committee on Tuesday, voted on on Wednesday and passed on Wednesday, one of the shortest periods of birth for a new bill that we have ever seen.

They offered eight different budgets today and tomorrow because they have not got a single budget that solves anything.

Walter Mondale got a lot of publicity when he turned in the debate, in Atlanta, and said to GARY HART, "Where is the beef?" The fact is that the liberal Democrats have run this House since 1955. They took control after the 1954 elections. I was 10 years old when they took control of this House. And I look at what they have done and I look at the years they have controlled the Ways and Means Committee and changed tax law, I look at the years they have controlled the Appropriations Committee and spent money, I look at the years they have controlled the authorizing committees and created new program after new program. Then they look up, suddenly, after creating an absolute disaster, having created 18 percent inflation by the beginning of 1981, having created 21 percent interest rates at the bank, having created an environment in which taxes were going up on working Americans year after year and our economy was decaying and, frankly, in some parts of America beginning to die, and they have the gall to turn and say, "Look how terrible the Reagan deficit is."

Ronald Reagan did not pass a single spending bill. The liberal Democrats did. They have controlled this House since 1955. Ronald Reagan did not pass a single appropriations bill. The liberal Democrats did. They have controlled this House since 1955. It is their deficit.

When I see senior members of the liberal Democratic leadership get up, and with total irresponsibility say, "We did not do it, we do not understand," I think of the child who happened to knock the cookie jar off in the kitchen and turned to Mom and said, "Gee, I don't know how it got there on the floor all broken up. I wasn't involved. It must have been a little demon who came in the kitchen." It is just ridiculous.

Mr. MCEWEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. MCEWEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to engage the gentleman in a colloquy here, if I may, because what he has just said has often been repeated by members of the minority, Republicans in this House, and yet I am not sure that it has been completely understood.

In 1976, in the debate between Jimmy Carter and Gerald Ford, James Earl Carter pointed his finger at Gerald Ford and said: "You were in Congress for 25 years. Why didn't you do something about it?"

Well, Gerald Ford responded in his gracious manner, as he does, that he was in the minority, he did not chair the committees and elsewhere.

Let us put it in more graphic terms: Can the President purchase gasoline for the White House automobiles without an authorization from Congress?

Mr. GINGRICH. The answer is "No."

Mr. McEWEN. Can the President buy a pencil for the Department of Housing and Urban Development without approval from the Congress?

Mr. GINGRICH. The answer is "No."

Mr. McEWEN. In 1974 there was a court case in which President Nixon at the time declined to spend certain dollars. The bureaucracy took the President of the United States to court. The district court ruled that it was incumbent upon the President to expend those funds that had been authorized and appropriated by the Congress.

So not only can the President not spend dollars without the approval of Congress, he then has an obligation to make those funds available for spending once this Congress has agreed to do that. Is that not correct?

Mr. GINGRICH. As the gentleman knows, it was the liberal Democrats who were the most aggressively against impoundment, and it was the liberal Democrats who were most insistent that when they passed the bills, the President had to spend the money.

Mr. McEWEN. When we say the "majority party," no Republican has chaired a committee in the House of Representatives in 48 of the last 52 years, with the single exception of 1949 and 1950, 1953 and 1954. Except for those 4 years, not since 1930 has a Republican chaired a committee. That means the chairman is the one who calls bills up for consideration, and so no bills have been brought up for consideration except by approval of the chairman.

Mr. GINGRICH. Let me ask the gentleman something. What was the gentleman doing in 1954?

Mr. McEWEN. The last time a Republican was elected to chair a committee in the Congress I was 2 years old, and I believe at no time has any Republican Member of this House of Representatives been allowed to sit here.

Mr. GINGRICH. Let me ask the same question of the gentleman from California, if I might. What was the gentleman doing in 1954?

Mr. HUNTER. In 1954 I was 6 years old.

Mr. GINGRICH. The gentleman from California is much older than the gentleman from Ohio, who was only 2. Not only do I have gray hair, but I am the elder statesman of the three of us. I was 10 that year.

Mr. McEWEN. I think it is important to emphasize now that when people run against the deficit, when they say——

Mr. GINGRICH. I will correct myself. I was 11. I have been watching GARY HART too long.

Mr. McEWEN. I was born in 1950. The election of 1952 was the last time that a Republican was elected chairman of a committee. They were allowed to serve for their 2 years, and then were thrown out.

But the emphasis here is that they will literally run against their record, and they will run this fall against the programs that they enacted, the spending programs that they enacted and the inflation that was brought to our country, and say, "Even though we controlled it every year for the last 30-some years, we will correct it this time."

In fact, the Speaker of the House was quoted on the front page of the Washington Post—and I often carry it in my portfolio—as saying, "Sure, we overtaxed; sure, we overregulated. Sure, we overspent. But the 1980's was when we were going to change those things."

Well, the 1980's are here. I think that those who chair every committee, who control every bill that comes to this floor, where no Republicans can bring a bill to the floor of this House without the approval of the Speaker and the majority party, so therefore they do not come at all, that they have to take account and responsibility for what has been done.

Mr. GINGRICH. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HUNTER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I have to leave, because I have to go and take a constituent from San Diego, who is in the construction business, back to the airport so he can go back, because he has more people working now and building houses and in the construction trade than have ever been working in his operation for the last 5 or 6 years. So we have got so much productivity in this country right now I think that the American people cannot understand what the Democrat leadership is complaining about under this administration.

I think it is kind of unusual in this year, in this election year of 1984, the Democrats suddenly are doing this about-face that the gentleman from Ohio spoke about, and they are running against deficits that they created, and Republicans are running on jobs, that 4.9 million jobs that have been created.

And, incidentally, the gentleman has referred to Mr. HART and some of the changes of names he has gone through. I know that the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. GINGRICH) did not change his name.

Mr. GINGRICH. Unfortunately, that is not even true. I was adopted as a kid.

Mr. McEWEN. Gingrich-pence just does not ring.

Mr. GINGRICH. We talked one time about going around with a group of shortened names on our side. But that is the entire problem, I think, of the liberal Democratic Party. They would like to shorten their proposals, so you only see the part of the budget they give you, not the part that they take away from you. And the point I tried to make this afternoon both with the distinguished majority leader and the gentleman from Colorado who offered the President's budget was that if you look at the entire liberal Democratic budget as offered by their two leading candidates for President, and as basically seconded by Mr. Jackson, they want to raise taxes so massively. And I want to really bring back and close on this, because I think it is something that the American people, as they watch all of these games today and tomorrow, need to confront. It is impossible for the liberal Democratic leadership to offer a budget comparable to what Mr. HART or Mr. Mondale or Mr. Jackson is proposing because the tax increase would be so staggering, if the American people understood that the modes member, Mr. Mondale, is almost $1,000 per American over the next 5 years, and the more liberal budget, Mr. HART, is over $1,000 per American for the next 5 years, the results I think would lead to the collapse of any hope of the Democratic Presidential candidate getting anywhere. In fact, that candidate, whichever one it was, would become such an enormous anchor it would drag down the whole party.

So in order to hide from the American people the reality of what their Presidential candidates are proposing, they tried today to pull off what I think was frankly a cheap shot that demeaned the House.

Every American who is working for a living, every American who has children who are working for a living, every American who hopes to earn a little bit extra and save and to be able someday to buy a house or a car or go to school, ought to be aware of the fact that today the liberal Democratic leadership, with absolute irresponsibility, walked off from the process of providing a realistic budget.

Today the liberal Democratic leadership hid from their own candidates, even though they endorsed those candidates. We have the final, grand irony, that while the Speaker of the House has endorsed Mr. Mondale, it was a gentleman from Colorado, the home of Senator HART, who came up and offered not Mr. HART's budget, not Mr. Mondale's budget, but instead the President's budget.

I think it is a sign of how bankrupt they are that in fact there is no beef left on their side of the aisle, and all they have left are petty political checks.

STRONG-ARMING THE CONSUMER—ADJUSTABLE RATE MORTGAGES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANNUNZIO) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, according to Michael Allen, president of Chicago's Crown Mortgage Co.:

> Lenders will end up foreclosing on people who take ARM's (adjustable rate mortgages) if the rates do not go down next year, and most people realize the rates are not going to go down.

In the fourth quarter of 1983, 55 percent of conventionally financed existing home sales and 45 percent of all new home sales were ARM financed. The U.S. housing forecast for 1984 is 1.15 million to 1.75 million single family starts and 175,000 condominium starts. Because of the increased activity in the housing market, it is necessary that consumers be forewarned of the pitfalls associated with adjustable rate mortgages.

Lenders offer adjustable rate mortgages to attract consumers who might not otherwise be able to find an affordable house to purchase. Adjustable rate mortgages provide a lower initial interest rate on the amount borrowed than do fixed rate mortgages. And that is the rub. The beginning interest rate of an ARM is not guaranteed for the full term of the mortgage, so the consumer must gamble. Usually, lenders offer the lower interest rate for a year or two, and then tie the future interest rate on the mortgage into one of several economic indices. Consumers eager to become homeowners may seize the chance for lower payments, without giving full consideration to mortgage rates that may rise uncontrollably in the future.

Adjustable rate mortgages often are deceptive because ARM's require less of a downpayment than other types of mortgage arrangements. The first-year payments required of the homeowner are also usually substantially less than those payments required under fixed-rate mortgages. Buyers, who assume that, first, interest rates will go down; second, their personal net economic worth will increase; or, third, they will be moving shortly and will resell the property before the initiation period expires, take the bait. And that is when homeowners find out that ARM's are just a teasing device. Homeowners think they can afford a house, buy it, interest rates increase, and then, bingo, the homeowners must sell their new purchase or have it sold out from under.

When the homeowner qualified for the ARM, the homeowner may not have adequately calculated the amount of funds necessary to meet the ARM's future requirements. The consumer must fully understand the nature and requirements of the adjustable rate mortgage before committing to the terms of the mortgage. A change in interest rate of as much as 2 percent is not at all unusual, and the difference in the mortgage payments may make a previously affordable home unaffordable.

The educated consumer must understand the inherent risk in ARM's. When a fixed-rate mortgage is issued, the lender fully assumes the risk of fluctuating rates in the transaction. For example, if a fixed-rate mortgage is issued at 12 percent and interest rates rise to 16 percent, the fixed-rate mortgage remains at 12 percent, and the consumer is protected from the vagaries of the market. In the case of an ARM, the change in the interest rate falls completely on the homeowner. The degree of risk in the transaction is transferred directly from the lender to the homeowner. Unfortunately, the homeowner is usually the party least able to bear that risk.

For consumers capable of adapting to the increased requirements of an adjustable rate mortgage, the ARM may be a good way to finance the purchase of the family castle. But for homebuyers who can just meet the required initial-month payments of the adjustable rate mortgage, the ARM may not be an appropriate means of financing the purchase of a home. Instead of being secure in the castle, heedless homeowners might find themselves besieged by the knights of foreclosure.●

A BILL OF RIGHTS FOR CONSUMERS: ACCESS TO THEIR OWN MONEY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. MINISH) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. MINISH. Mr. Speaker, all over this Nation, there are reports of financial institutions delaying customers' access to funds deposited by check or money orders.

These delays for the most part are unnecessary and they impose tremendous hardships on working families, the elderly, small businessmen and others who do not have great surpluses in their accounts and who cannot wait days and weeks for access to their own money.

Mr. Speaker, the Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs Committee, of which I am a member, has launched hearings into the issue with hopes of coming up with solutions that will give customers early access to their funds. I am today introducing legislation, similar to that sponsored by committee chairman, FERNAND J. ST GERMAIN. This bill spells out the maximum period in which an institution may hold a deposit and requires the Federal Reserve to develop a new program that will provide for even faster access to the funds.

The committee, Mr. Speaker, has received numerous complaints showing that some financial institutions hold checks for 2 and 3 weeks—some longer—before crediting the accounts of the customers. Yet the Federal Reserve testifies that it requires only a few days—even with out the State checks—for the check to clear. What happens in many instances is that the banks make profits on the funds from the time they are collected and the date of actual crediting to the customers' account. In the meantime, the customer loses interest and use of the money.

Mr. Speaker, these delays are outrageous, and they should be reduced quickly. There is no reason for a hard-working family to be forced to dip into their savings, or to be deprived of necessities while the banks play this floating game. In too many cases, customers—thinking their deposit has cleared—write checks, only to have them bounce and be faced with $10, $15, and $20 fees.

My legislation will put an end to this practice and provide consumers with a clear bill of rights on the use of their own money.●

H.R. 5342, LEGISLATION TO ESTABLISH A COMMISSION ON CAPITAL MARKETS AND IMPOSE A MORATORIUM ON FORMATION OF COMBINED INSURANCE, BANKING, AND SECURITIES ORGANIZATIONS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Colorado (Mr. WIRTH) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the distinguished chairman of the Energy and Commerce Committee, JOHN D. DINGELL, and seven of my colleagues on the Subcommittee on Telecommunications, Consumer Protection, and Finance joined me in introducing H.R. 5342, legislation to establish a commission on capital markets and impose an 18-month moratorium on formation of combined insurance, banking, and securities organizations. In yesterday's RECORD, I explained the concerns that led us to introducing the legislation.

Today, I would like to include in the RECORD a section-by-section analysis of the legislation, which follows:

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS—CAPITAL MARKETS COMMISSION AND MORATORIUM ACT

TITLE I—FINDINGS AND POLICY

This title sets out the findings of Congress that there has been a shift of capital from long- to short-term investments and other fundamental changes in American financial markets; that regulatory agencies have broadly interpreted laws enacted many years before these changes occurred; that most of the underlying goals of laws governing American financial institutions remain valid today; that the laws enacted to achieve those goals mandated a separation between securities, banking, and insurance activities; that until there is assurance that existing regulatory objectives and the stability of the financial system will not be undermined by combining securities, banking and insurance activities, and financial and nonfinancial activities, such combinations should be temporarily postponed; and that a comprehensive and objective overview of the nation's capital needs and of how changes in financial structure affect the soundness of financial intermediaries and their ability to meet those needs would provide a sound basis for reform legislation.

TITLE II—MORATORIUM ON FINANCIAL INTERMEDIARY COMBINATIONS

Section 201 prohibits mergers, acquisitions or affiliations between securities firms, insurance companies, and depository institutions, and between any of these financial intermediaries and businesses engaged in nonfinancial activities. It prohibits these financial intermediaries and non-financial businesses from engaging directly in one another's primary activities unless these combinations of enterprises and activities were explicitly authorized by Federal or State law or regulation before January 1, 1983.

Section 202 permits the continuation of "prohibited" combinations of enterprises or activities begun before March 31, 1984, unless they are expanded by means of additional mergers, acquisitions, or affiliations, or by a substantial transfer of resources into otherwise prohibited activities from the parent organization.

Section 203 provides for action by federal or state regulators or any aggrieved party to enforce the moratorium in the district courts of the United States.

Section 204 defines the primary business of securities firms, insurance companies, and depository institutions, and depository holding companies; defines non-financial activities as the production or sale of manufactured or unmanufactured articles, materials, or supplies, or the provision of services that are not the primary business of securities firms, insurance companies or depository institutions, and defines ownership, control, affiliation and other terms used in the Act.

Section 205 provides that the provisions of this title shall terminate on December 31, 1985.

TITLE III—COMMISSION ON CAPITAL MARKETS

Section 301 provides for the establishment of a Commission on Capital Markets composed of 18 members jointly appointed by the Speaker of the House and the majority leader of the Senate after consultation with the chairmen and ranking minority members of the House Banking Committee, the House Energy and Commerce Committee, and the Senate Banking Committee; requires that the members of the Commission be acknowledged experts in financial and investment matters and represent users and suppliers of funds raised in capital and credit markets as well as financial intermediaries; and permits the Speaker of the House and Majority Leader of the Senate to appoint members from congressional committees with jurisdiction over the issues to be evaluated to serve as ex officio, nonvoting members of the Commission.

Section 302 provides that the functions of the Commission include an evaluation of: the capital and credit needs of the U.S. economy to sustain long-term economic growth; the effect of current regulatory policies on the distribution of savings and the fairness, efficiency and cost of raising capital and credit; the role of the federal government in allocating capital and credit; the effects of current and proposed changes in regulation and financial structure on competition and soundness, current safety mechanisms, the protection of investors and depositors and financial concentration, and an evaluation of methods for ensuring a smooth adjustment of regulatory and institutional structures during this period of rapid innovation.

This section also provides for consideration by the Commisison of the impact of telecommunications and information technologies on financial structure and the effects of international capital flows on U.S. borrowers; encourages the Commission to use government and private data bases and existing studies and materials to avoid duplication of effort; would require that the Commission maintain a close working relationship with its ex officio members and consult with heads of the relevant regulatory agencies, providing opportunities for these officials and ex officio members to comment on the Commission's evaluations before the submission of its report to Congress. This underlines the Commission's intended role as a consensus builder.

Subsection (b) provides that the Commission submit a report to Congress within nine months of its initial meeting, taking into account the comments of its ex officio members and heads of relevant government departments and agencies, and that the report include an estimate of the capital needs of the U.S. economy; recommendations for legislative or administrative actions to reform and improve financial regulation to ensure that the nation's capital requirements will be met; and data and analyses used in developing the Commission's recommendations and findings.

Section 303 provides that members serve on the Commission without compensation but are reimbursed for all necessary expenses.

Section 304 enables the Commission to appoint staff without regard to federal laws governing the number, classification or compensation of employees; limits the maximum compensation for staff to rates equivalent to grade GS-18 of the General Schedule; and exempts staff and members of the Commission from federal laws relating to conflicts of interest or other restrictions applicable to federal government service or employment.

Section 305 empowers the Commission to sit, take testimony, authorize printing and binding, enter into contracts, make expenditures, and administer oaths; authorizes the Commission to obtain information (including estimates and statistics) and suggestions from government officers, agencies and departments; authorizes heads of government agencies to make the facilities and services of their agencies available to the Commission on request and on a reimbursement basis; and prohibits officers or agencies of the United States from imposing restrictions on the Commission's activities or requiring that it submit reports or recommendations for approval, comment, or review before they are submitted to Congress.

Section 306 provides for the dissolution of the Commission ninety days after the submission of its report to Congress.

UDALL-CHENEY ACID RAIN CONTROL BILL

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL) is recognized for 10 minutes.

● Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, I have thought long and hard about the acid rain issue in the last few months. As an environmentalist, I feel strongly about the need for tough acid rain controls; as a westerner, I want to make sure that any acid rain solution does not impose an unreasonable share of the cost on Western consumers.

Representative CHENEY and I are introducing a bill today that achieves both goals. According to a report by the Office of Technology Assessment, in 1980 sulfur dioxide emissions in the 31 Eastern and Midwestern States totaled 22.4 million tons. Our bill calls for reductions in sulfur dioxide emissions of 11 million tons per year by 1996—one-half to be achieved by 1991. The Waxman-Sikorski bill requires reductions of 10 million tons per year by 1993. We believe a phased reduction of sulfur dioxide emissions makes sense. A reasonable time schedule will allow States some flexibility as they work toward reducing their sulfur dioxide emissions by almost one-half.

The Udall-Cheney bill also allows flexibility in how those reductions would be achieved. Installing scrubbers on old powerplants is an expensive proposition. By requiring scrubbers, H.R. 3400 may cost $46 billion by the year 2000; our bill would cost consumers $24 billion by the year 2000. Any acid rain control bill is bound to be expensive. It makes sense to let those responsible for reducing SO_2 emissions decide the means for achieving those reductions and thereby hold down the cost.

Our bill also:

Prohibits further increases in SO^2 and NOx emissions after 1996.

Provides for regional negotiations among Governors to decide how the reduction would be achieved.

Establishes a National Air Quality Employment Impact Commission to study the employment effects of the bill.

I believe there are many Members like myself and Mr. CHENEY that feel strongly about the need for tough acid rain controls and share our concerns about H.R. 3400. I invite them to cosponsor the Udall-Cheney acid rain bill.●

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to:

H.R. 5353. A bill to designate a Federal building in Bangor, Maine, as the "Margaret Chase Smith Federal Building"; to the Committee on Public Works and Transportation.

By Mr. UDALL:

H.R. 5354. A bill to convey certain lands to the Zuni Indian Tribe for religious purposes; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

By Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI:

H.R. 5355. A bill to amend title 31 of the United States Code to accelerate the collection and deposit of payments to executive agencies; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. PICKLE:

H.R. 5356. A bill to amend title II of the Social Security Act to improve the administration of earnings test; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. CAMPBELL (for himself, Mr. FRENZEL, Mr. THOMAS of California, Mr. MOORE, Mr. GRADISON, and Mr. SCHULZE):

H.R. 5357. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide that the amount of the charitable deduction allowable for expenses incurred in the operation of a motor vehicle will be $0.12 per mile; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. DE LA GARZA:

H.R. 5358. A bill to enable honey producers and handlers to finance a nationally coordinated research, promotion, and consumer information program designed to expand their markets for honey; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. LELAND:

H.R. 5359. A bill to amend title, 5 United States Code, to revise the pay structure for Federal employees whose duties primarily relate to firefighting; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

By Mr. MINISH:

H.R. 5360. A bill to limit the number of days a depository institution may restrict the availability of funds which are deposited by check; to the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs.

By Mr. STARK:

H.R. 5361. A bill to extend for 5 years a tax provision to encourage employers to provide legal services for their employees; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. FORD of Tennessee:

H.R. 5362. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, title XVI, of the Social Security Act, and part A of title IV of such act to improve asset verification for benefits under the SSI and AFDC programs and to make other improvements in such programs; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. CONTE:

H.R. 5363. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide that gain or loss will not be recognized on transfers between spouses or incident to divorce; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. DYSON (for himself and Mr. BENNETT):

H.R. 5364. A bill to authorize the construction of versatile motor-vehicle-carrying vessels under title VII of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. SAM B. HALL, JR. (for himself, Mr. MAZZOLI, Mr. FRANK, Mr. BERMAN, Mr. BOUCHER, Mr. KINDNESS, Mr. SHAW, and Mr. McCOLLUM):

H.R. 5365. A bill to amend title 28, United States Code, to provide for the selection of the court of appeals to decide multiple appeals filed with respect to the same agency order; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. LaFALCE:

H.R. 5366. A bill to provide assistance to victims of crime, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SHELBY:

H.R. 5367. A bill to amend title 38, United States Code, to increase from $20,000 to $22,000 the maximum amount of guaranty available from the Veterans' Administration for a loan for the purchase of a manufactured home; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

By Mr. SUNDQUIST:

H.R. 5368. A bill to suspend for a 3-year period the duty on amiodarone; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. UDALL:

H.R. 5369. A bill to authorize appropriations for the Department of Energy for certain civilian energy programs for fiscal years 1985 and 1986, and for other purposes; jointly, to the Committees on Energy and Commerce, Interior and Insular Affairs, and Science and Technology.

By Mr. UDALL (for himself and Mr. CHENEY):

H.R. 5370. A bill to amend the Clean Air Act to control certain sources of sulfur dioxides and nitrogen oxides to reduce acid deposition; to the Committee on Energy and Commerce.

By Mr. LEWIS of Florida:

H. Con. Res. 284. Concurrent resolution urging the President to direct the Permanent Representative of the United States to the United Nations to bring before the United Nations the question of the involvement by the Government of Cuba in drug dealing, smuggling, and trafficking; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

H. Con. Res. 285. Concurrent resolution expressing the sense of the Congress that the Secretary of State should request the Organization of American States to consider as soon as possible the question of the involvement by the Government of Cuba in drug dealing, smuggling, and trafficking in the Western Hemisphere; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. DENNY SMITH:

H. Res. 477. Resolution expressing the sense of the U.S. House of Representatives that the U.S. Treasury should not, without the express approval of the Congress of the United States, expend or transfer any funds to less developed nations which are delinquent, or have been repeatedly delinquent, on interest payments to American banks; to the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs.

MEMORIALS

Under clause 4 of rule XXII, memorials were presented and referred as follows:

356. By the SPEAKER: Memorial of the Legislature of the State of California, relative to agricultural pests; to the Committee on Agriculture.

357. Also, memorial of the Legislature of the State of South Carolina, relative to foreign textile producing and manufacturing interests; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

AMENDMENTS

Under clause 6 of rule XXIII, proposed amendments were submitted as follows:

H.R. 1510

By Mr. DE LA GARZA:

—Page 41, after line 21, insert the following new section (and conform the table of contents accordingly):

LIABILITY OF OWNERS AND OPERATORS OF INTERNATIONAL BRIDGES AND TOLL ROADS TO PREVENT THE UNAUTHORIZED LANDING OF ALIENS

SEC. 115. Section 271 (8 U.S.C. 1321) is amended by inserting at the end the following new subsection:

"(c)(1) No person described in subsection (a) who establishes to the satisfaction of the Attorney General that such person has acted diligently and reasonably to fulfill the duty imposed by such subsection shall be liable for the penalty described in such subsection, notwithstanding the failure of such person to prevent the unauthorized landing of any alien.

"(2)(A) At the request of any owner or operator of any international bridge or toll road described in subsection (a), the Attorney General shall inspect any facility established, or any method utilized, at a point of entry into the United States by such owner or operator for the purpose of complying with subsection (a). The Attorney General shall approve any such facility or method (for such period of time as the Attorney General may prescribe) which the Attorney General determines is satisfactory for such purpose.

"(B) Proof that any owner or operator has diligently maintained any facility, or utilized any method, which has been approved by the Attorney General under subparagraph (A) (within the period for which such approval is effective) shall be prima facie evidence that such owner or operator acted diligently and reasonably to fulfill the duty imposed by subsection (a) (within the meaning of paragraph (1))."

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

HON. DICK CHENEY OF WYOMING
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mr. CHENEY. Mr. Speaker, Mr. UDALL and I have today introduced a bill to curb environmental damage caused by acid rain by requiring reductions in emissions of sulfur dioxide and nitrogen oxide.

In the Northeastern United States and Canada, acid ran caused mainly by airborne pollution from midwestern coal-fired powerplants is doing serious damage to the environment. While some may consider this a regional issue, I believe it to be of national concern, and I believe Americans from all parts of the country believe acid rain-causing emissions should be curbed.

Citizens in many parts of the country, including the West, have already sacrificed to protect the environment and curb sulfur dioxide emissions. According to the Salt Lake Deseret News, for example, the West burns coal with a third of the sulfur content and cleans its emissions better (four times as many plants in the West use complex, expensive emissions-scrubbing devices) than any other region of the country. Let me emphasize this has been accomplished at no small cost to western utility customers.

The problem lies with midwestern coal-burning powerplants, many of which do not adequately control sulfur dioxide emissions which are a primary cause of acid rain. In its search to find a national answer to the acid rain problem, the House is faced with two basic choices. First, it could the midwestern powerplants which are the main source of the pollution to install mechanical equipment called smokestack scrubbers to filter out the sulfur dioxide that is produced when coal is burned, and which is the prime cause of acid rain. Scrubbers are very expensive, costing some $200 million when installed in a new powerplant, and even more when added to an existing, older plant.

Second, the Government could require the appropriate reductions in pollution, but refrain from dictating precisely how those reductions should be achieved. This approach would leave powerplants free to choose the most efficient and cost-effective methods of complying. Some plants might decide to wash the coal before it is burned to remove sulfur and other pollution-generating materials. This would be cheaper than scrubbing the pollutants from the smoke after burning the coal. Or, in many cases, plants might find it cheaper to stop using coal with a high sulfur content, and switch to the kind of low-sulfur coal that is abundant in the West and many parts of the East.

Congressman UDALL and I have reviewed the existing House bills, as well as other suggested alternatives for solving the acid rain problem. We do not believe for several reasons that the primary bill, H.R. 3400, represents a reasonable acid rain solution.

First, it is unworkable in its present form. According to extensive studies completed by ICF, a respected research/consulting firm in Washington which does work for the Environmental Protection Agency, the Department of Energy, and others, the maximum level of scrubber installations which could be achieved by 1990 is 10 or, perhaps at the outside, 20 gigawatts, not the 60 or more gigawatts which H.R. 3400 attempts to achieve through Government dictate.

Second, it is far too expensive. Estimates by the Environmental Protection Agency, for example, suggest that unnecessary costs associated with the H.R. 3400 approach could exceed $40 billion over the next 20 years.

Third, instead of requiring those who are causing the pollution to pay the cleanup costs, H.R. 3400 dumps an enormous cost on citizens throughout the country by imposing a nationwide tax on electricity consumers. So consumers of clean utilities would pay twice—once for the good job their utilities are already doing, and once again to subsidize a polluting utility elsewhere in the country.

Fourth, H.R. 3400 may avoid localized job shifts in the high-sulfur coal mining industry, but it does so at the expense of jobs nationally and at a cost to American consumers of hundreds of thousands of dollars for each job that might be affected. It is an unnecessary cost because cheaper ways to minimize job shift effects are available. It is a cost which I believe most Americans are flatly unwilling to pay.

Finally, H.R. 3400 represents the "Washington Knows Best" approach which suggests, erroneously in my opinion, that Washington should not only dictate the goal, but also the method for getting there.

Because of these flaws in H.R. 3400, Congressman UDALL and I are today introducing what we believe is a sensible alternative to the forced-scrubber approach. Let me summarize the highlights of our bill:

First, it is a freedom-of-choice bill. Local utilities will decide, based upon their special circumstances, how best to reduce their sulfur dioxide emissions. This will encourage the use of inexpensive, immediately available, and innovative solutions. It also will encourage future innovation in control approaches and the development of new ways to burn both low- and high-sulfur coal—rather than locking us into old, inefficient technologies.

Second, it is a least-cost bill which will save consumers more than $1 billion annually over the long term.

Third, it is a more effective approach to reducing acid rain-causing sulfur dioxide emissions. The bill phases the reductions, 5.5 million tons by 1991 and 11 million tons annually by 1996, to allow both quicker reductions now and ultimately larger reductions in the future.

Fourth, our bill creates jobs nationally, although it is possible that it may result in some localized job shifts. Therefore, the bill establishes a National Air Quality Employment Impact Commission to analyze the extent of possible job shifts and make recommendations concerning the most cost-efficient methods of minimizing the effects of such shifts. It will report to Congress by December 31, 1987, long before any job shifts would occur.

This bill represents a commonsense approach and a reasonable alternative to forced-scrubber legislation. I believe it deserves the support of consumers, environmentalists, and citizens across the Nation.

I have included at the end of my statement a summary of the bill and a comparison with the provisions of H.R. 3400.

COST-EFFECTIVE ACID RAIN LEGISLATION FACT SHEET

Primary Sponsors: Representative MORRIS UDALL (D-Ariz.) and Representative DICK CHENEY (R-Wyo.).

MAJOR CONCEPTS

Freedom of Choice: Utilities are free to choose the reduction method (e.g., emissions trading, least emission dispatching, fuel switching, scrubbing, coal washing) which is most cost effective for their particular situation.

Least Cost: Utilities are allowed the flexibility to select a control method which is best-suited to their specific operations, thereby saving consumers more than $22 billion over the next 15 years.

Polluter Pays/No Taxpayer Subsidies: Unlike other acid rain legislation, this proposal does not impose a nationwide tax and recognizes past emissions clean-up by utilities across the country. The primary cost of the clean-up is borne by those facilities causing the damage, not by the American utility consumer or the taxpayer.

Phased Reduction of Sulfur Dioxide Emissions: The Udall/Cheney legislation mandates that sulfur dioxide emissions be reduced by 5.5 million tons annually by 1991 and that emissions be reduced a total of 11 million tons annually by 1996. This reduction level is higher than that proposed by any other legislation.

Examines Job Shifts: While the bill creates jobs nationally, it also may cause localized job shifts. Therefore it establishes a National Air Quality Employment Impact Commission charged with analyzing the potential extent of such shifts and determining the most cost effective method for minimizing possible impacts.

SUMMARY OF COST-EFFECTIVE ACID RAIN LEGISLATION

Creates a 31-State Acid Deposition Impact Region.

Requires that within this region, sulfur dioxide emissions be reduced 11 million tons per year from 1980 levels before 1996.

Mandates one-half the reductions occur by 1991.

Provides for regional negotiations among Governors to determine how the 11 million ton reduction will be achieved.

Provides that if the Governors fail to reach an agreement, the required emission reduction for each State will be determined based upon the sulfur content of each State's emissions.

Allows each state to develop its own sulfur dioxide reduction plan delineating the manner in which the required reductions will be achieved.

Provides that if, after 30 months, a State fails to adopt a reduction plan, all existing major utility sources within the State must adhere to a standard of 1.2 lbs. per million BTU/SO_2 limit within 6 months.

Mandates that after 1996, no further increases in SO_2 or NO_x levels will be allowed in the region, with limited exceptions.

Allows for the use of alternative means to reduce sulfur emissions such as emissions trading, fuel substitution, coal washing, least emissions dispatching or scrubbers.

Provides $10,000,000 for 5 years to conduct additional research on acid rain and related matters.

Creates a National Air Quality Employment Impact Commission to study the employment effects of this acid rain control legislation and make recommendations to Congress by 1987, long before job shift effects might occur.

COMPARISON WITH WAXMAN-SIKORSKI FORCED TECHNOLOGY APPROACH

Results	Udall-Cheney legislation [1]	Waxman-Sikorski H.R. 3400 [2]
Cumulative capital costs in 1996 (billions)	$8	$21
Total cumulative consumer cost by the year 2000 (billions)	24	46
Immediacy of results (1993 cumulative reduction) (million tons)	16	14
Cumulative reductions in the year 2000 (million tons)	82	80

Cit.; "Analysis of Coal Production and Employment Impacts of the Waxman-Sikorski Bill and a Cost Effective Equivalent," ICF, Inc., Sept. 22, 1983; Capital cost analysis assumes no demand-induced scrubber capital cost premium. Emissions—Analysis assumes 10 gigawatts of retrofit scrubber capacity available by 1990, and 10 gigawatts every year thereafter at average reduction of 143M tons SO_2/gigawatt; See, ICF, Inc., Op. Cit., February 1984, appendix C.

Provisions	Udall/Cheney legislation	Waxman/Sikorski H.R. 3400
Funding philosophy	Traditional (sound management) policy that polluter pays	Consumers of "clean" utilities subsidize polluting utilities.
Funding mechanism	Utilities that pollute cover the cost of reducing their emissions	11-yr tax on nonnuclear electric energy to be paid by all consumers.
Consumer tax		1 mill per kilowatt-hour tax on all nonnuclear generated electricity in the 48 contiguous States.
Method of control	Utilities can choose, from among several options, the least expensive most immediately available alternative to reduce emissions.	Utilities are forced to use the most expensive, least reliable of emissions control options—complex devices called smokestack scrubbers.
Reduction schedule	Phased reduction: 5.5 million tons annually by 1991, 11 million tons annually by 1996.	10 million tons annually by 1993.
Implementation procedures	Initially, States have total flexibility to determine how to achieve compliance	No State flexibility until 50 powerplants emitting the highest levels of sulfur dioxide reduce to specified levels.
Job effects	Creates jobs nationally but results in some localized job shifts	May avoid localized job shifts at the expense of jobs nationally.
Provisions for cushioning effects of potential job shifts	Creates National Air Quality Employment Impact Commission to analyze the extent of potential job shifts and to determine cost efficient ways to cushion these effects.	No provision for reviewing national employment effects. Cost for avoiding localized job shifts is several hundred thousand dollars per affected job.
Research	Provides $10 million annually for 5 yr for additional research on acid rain	No funds are allocated for research.
Feasibility	Goals can be achieved at reasonable costs by the specified dates using proven, cost efficient methods.	It is not possible to install more than 30 percent of the 60-plus gigawatts of scrubber capacity targeted in H.R. 3400 for installation by 1990.
Potential for encouraging innovative solutions	Would foster the development of new and innovative approaches to emissions control	Legislation locks in old inefficient technology.●

IN COMMEMORATION OF THE 10TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE SAN PEDRO BAY HISTORICAL SOCIETY

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay special recognition to the San Pedro Bay Historical Society which will be celebrating its 10th anniversary on April 11 at the San Pedro, Calif., Maritime Museum. Very appropriately on this special occasion, the historical society will have available its recent publication, "San Pedro: A Pictorial History," which charts the history of San Pedro from the 16th century to the present.

The San Pedro Historical Society was incorporated in July 1974. In 1975, the society established historical archives with over 10,000 holdings, including photos, tapes, documents, and books. In 1977, the society founded the Shoreline, a highly regarded periodical on local and area history.

The society has played an enormous role in obtaining recognition for historical landmarks in the San Pedro area and in providing an invaluable source of information to local schools and the community. In 1979, as a result of a successful application to the State of California, years of exhaustive research were culminated in the dedication of California State monument No. 920 at Ft. MacArthur commemorating the old Hidehouse-Embarcadero site, the first structure on San Pedro Bay, that marked the beginning of development of the San Pedro Bay Harbor. It has also assisted in the dedication of Pepper Tree Plaza, the nomination of Battery Barlow-Saxton to the National Register of Historical Places, the preservation of the old Civil War Camp Drum powder magazine, and the designation of early homes within the 19th century San Pedro district of Vinegar Hill as an historical preservation zone.

THE LOSS OF A MUSICAL GIANT

OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, April 1, the world lost a musical talent with the death of singer, songwriter, and entertainer Marvin Gaye, Jr. Mr. Gaye was a native of the District of Columbia. He was a graduate of Randall Junior High School and Cardozo High School.

Mr. Gaye's rise to musical prominence in the early 1960's was made possible by the Motown Recording Co. which at the time was the only black recording company investing primarily in black performers. Under the guidance of Barry Gordy, Jr., Mr. Gaye became an essential component of the "Motown Sound." He was influential in the shaping of rhythm and blues and contemporary pop music. His musical repertoire included "Stubborn Kind of Fellow," "Ain't No Mountain High Enough," "One More Heartache," and "Inner City Blues." His songs were oftentimes a reflection of his life.

It was in his classic hit album, "What's Going On" released in 1971, that Mr. Gaye spoke to the quality of life in the world, civil rights, the need for peace and social justice, urban decay, and the ecology. In 1983 he received a Grammy award for the best rhythm and blues single.

The tragic and untimely death of Marvin Gaye, Jr., has saddened the entertainment world, his hometown, and the many people he touched with his music.●

FEDERAL AID IN EDUCATION: REDUCING THE HUMAN DEFICIT

HON. AUGUSTUS F. HAWKINS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

● Mr. HAWKINS. Mr. Speaker, in our consideration of the budget in the coming weeks it is my hope that we will be cognizant of the human dimensions of our actions. Over the past 3 years this administration has cut compensatory and vocational education, Head Start, guaranteed student loans, chapter I funds for educationally disadvantaged children, and other student aid programs. In real dollars, adjusted for inflation, Federal outlays for education actually dropped 14 percent from 1980 to 1983. We keep hearing from those who are concerned about improving the quality of education in America, yet those same persons are unwilling to make the long range investment in our youth so they will have the proper skills to assume emerging job occupations.

Even before the severe budget reductions in Federal education imposed by this administration, quality schooling was still unavailable to millions of American children. Many of these children who do not have access to effective schooling are handicapped, poor, and/or non-English speaking, making them prime targets to drop out of school.

A recent report by the Children's Defense Fund, highlighted the wrongheaded approach by this administration in a brief excerpt from their section on education.

Although Sam is 17, he is in the 10th grade at a suburban Minneapolis high school. When Sam first began school he had reading problems and seemed to have a poor memory. Sam's reading ability and self-esteem both improved when he received help through the title I compensatory education program during the second, fourth, and fifth grades. However, because the school district had limited funds, Sam was dropped from the program when he entered the sixth grade.

His school problems reappeared and his self-confidence dropped in seventh grade. He started skipping school and eventually broke the law. He ended up in a juvenile court and detention center. During his 3 months in the center, Sam received title I services again. He is now back in school, but only as a 10th grader.

Because of his age and level of frustration, Sam is a likely candidate to drop out of school. Title I, the program that could help him, is simply not available because his school district cannot afford it at the secondary school level.

As a result of this administration's economic policies the number of children in poverty has grown dramatically in the last 3 years, increasing the number of eligible title I students who will go underserved. The success of title I—now known as chapter I—programs is well documented in numerous education studies. But as the report from the Children's Defense Fund indicates the administration's budget and administrative tinkering with chapter I has largely reduced its scope of effectiveness.

It took 17 years and nine amendments to title I to create a system at the Federal, State, and local levels that would safeguard the education benefits of remedial instruction to low-achieving children in low-income neighborhoods. Now legislative and regulatory changes, budget cuts, and the Department of Education's low profile threaten to destroy the carefully woven fabric of this program.

Similar regulatory changes and budget reductions have reduced services for the handicapped, bilingual education programs, school desegregation assistance, migrant education, personnel development, education research, vocational education, student financial assistance, special tutorial programs for disadvantaged students, and adult public education.

The administration's proposals would include eliminating several small education programs, including women's education equity, a program aimed at increasing educational opportunities for women and girls and projects to eliminate persistent barriers to educational equity for women. This program is vitally important to women, who are the fastest growing poverty segment in the Nation. Although 51 percent of all women over 16 work outside the home—most for economic reasons—schools and colleges are still not adequately preparing women to support themselves and their families.

Other programs that would be targeted for elimination under the Reagan administration's proposals include the Follow Through program, which aids in the continuing development of children who have participated in Head Start or similar preschool programs; and Desegregation Training and Advisory Services.

Once again in a spurious attempt to attack Federal sector programs, the administration has missed the crucial point of human investment embodied in the Constitution of the United States, that is to "promote the general welfare." What happens to us as a nation when we cease to endow upon our citizens an opportunity for educational and social progress?

While the administration has embraced the rhetoric of the President's National Commission of Excellence in Education, their budget proposals offer no workable solutions, and only serve to further exacerbate the effects of past cuts in Federal education while ignoring the growing number of students in need of help. President Reagan is seeking to redefine American education in such a way that it would bring the Nation back to a time when regional disparities narrowed the quality of education for many children.

Mr. Speaker, we must overturn the regressive budget priorities of the last few years, and return to a human agenda that offers our citizens a legitimate and enduring foundation for success.●

"CENTRAL AMERICA: WHAT THE DEVIL IS GOING ON?" LOS ANGELES, MARCH 18, 1984

HON. THOMAS J. DOWNEY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mr. DOWNEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, the Congress of the United States has not once had a full and open debate on El Salvador in the 4 years that we have been so heavily involved there.

This year, if the administration gets its way, El Salvador will receive over $1 billion in economic and military aid. It is time for us to demand that the issue of our involvement in El Salvador be debated in full and open session on the floor of the House of Representatives.

Our colleague from California, GEORGE MILLER, has spoken out forcefully on the need for such a debate and the need for an alternative to our current practice of placing conditions on the aid we send. I think we need to ask ourselves whether these conditions have been effective in bringing about the changes in policy many of us believe are necessary.

I call to you attention a recent speech delivered by Mr. MILLER, to a town meeting in Los Angeles attended by several thousand people:

"CENTRAL AMERICA, WHAT THE DEVIL IS GOING ON?"

President Reagan's attempt to achieve a bipartisan policy for Central America has failed.

The Kissinger Commission was created by the President last fall to achieve domestic consensus around a policy of military escalation in Central America.

The bottom line of the Kissinger report is this: In El Salvador, increased military aid to the government is essential to defeat so-called Marxist-Leninist guerrillas who are tied to the Soviet Union, Cuba, and Nicaragua. In Nicaragua, covert subversion and American-sponsored terrorism are necessary to convince Sandinista hardliners to stop exporting revolution.

Yet the Kissinger report failed to produce the evidence that our policies in Central America deserve the support of the American people either on both moral and national security grounds. As hard as it tried, by raising the issues of sea lane protection, a military threat from the south, and Soviet bases in Latin America, the report was never able to support its argument that the national security stakes for the United States in El Salvador are very high.

It should not surprise us that, based on the Kissinger report, President Reagan has presented Congress with a request for over $8 billion in military and economic aid to Central America over the next five years.

But let me be clear:

There can be no economic recovery in Central America until peace is restored.

There can be no political settlement that is founded on military escalation and a widening of the war;

Our policy can no longer be based on the assumption that we have held for 100 years: that all revolutions in Central America are hostile to the interests of the United States, a belief that has been shaped by U.S. economic interests and a desire to maintain the status quo.

In 1984 and 1985, the Reagan Administration is requesting close to a billion dollars for El Salvador alone—a billion dollars to underwrite a government that has murdered close to 40,000 of its own citizens in the last four years.

This aid must be rejected.

To approve it ignores a fact that the authors of the Kissinger report, and officials in this Administration, know exist. The death squads, the Salvadoran military, the oligarchy, and the government are one and the same. It is impossible to separate them in purpose or in fact.

Those the Administration would help by increasing military aid are exactly those who would deny the citizens of El Salvador the benefits of social and economic justice.

What the Congress and the American people must come to understand is this: institutionalized murder by the government of El Salvador is made possible by the dollars given by this Administration with the consent of the Congress.

The very survival of the oligarchy and the military corruption depend on the existence of the death squads, on political repression—and on American dollars.

We can no longer cloak our policy in the illusion that aid to the military is not aid to the death squads. There is no such distinction in El Salvador. I can assure you that this is no secret to the Reagan Administration.

My colleagues in the Congress can no longer attempt to absolve themselves of responsibility for the murder and death of Salvadoran citizens simply by placing "conditions" on the hundreds of millions of dollars that they vote to send to El Salvador.

Conditions by the Congress and certification by the President are not effective. And no one in this room should allow a member of Congress to escape responsibility by saying that he or she voted for money only after requiring the President to certify that progress is being made on human rights and on the prosecution of the murderers of the American churchwomen or other citizens of the United States.

Think about what "certification" means under the Reagan Administration.

Ronald Reagan is incompetent to certify progress on human rights, because his Administration has rejected human rights as a driving force in foreign affairs.

Ronald Reagan is incompetent to certify progress in the prosecution of the murderers of American citizens because he has known throughout his term in office that the Salvadoran military, and therefore the government, are responsible for those murders.

This Administration has only one goal, and that is a military victory over the people of El Salvador. You know it; I know it; and the Salvadoran military, the death squads, and Roberto D'Aubuisson know it.

And as long as our government continues to ship billions of dollars in aid and weapons to El Salvador, the government-run death squads know that they can continue the killings and the cover-ups. And the American president will continue to look the other way.

We have made El Salvador into a client state and now we are captive of that client.

Now, there are those in both the Administration and in the Congress who predict that if we cut off aid, the guerrillas will win and the situation will worsen. That is a phony argument used by those who do not want to face the consequences of continuing the current policy.

By refusing to negotiate with the Salvadoran opposition, we are guaranteeing one of two eventual outcomes: a guerrillas victory over a demoralized, corrupt, and inept Salvadoran Army, or massive U.S. military participation to prevent the Army's defeat.

We must turn the argument of "Who lost El Salvador?" on its head. Those who fail to stand up to the Administration's current approach are the ones who will have the blood of more Salvadorans and more Americans on their hands.

We already know who murdered four U.S. churchwomen, who murdered the young reporter John Sullivan, and who murdered the American labor advisers. It was the government of El Salvador.

Let us not now compound those crimes by deeping, or even continuing, our involvement.

Let the names of Jean Donovan, Ita Ford, John Sullivan, Archbishop Romero and the others signal that if justice is to prevail, the government that ordered their deaths—not some lowly messenger—must be held accountable.

The jailer of Jacobo Timmerman was not just the man who turned the key—it was the government of Argentina.

The assassin of Orlando Letelier was not just the man who planted the bomb in his car on the streets of Washington, D.C.—it was the government of Chile.

And the government in San Salvador which issues the orders must be held accountable for mass brutality, torture and kidnapping—not just those who come in the middle of the night as "heavily armed men in civilian dress".

The time has come to say "no" to the government of El Salvador—no more money, no more military equipment, no more complicity in the killings.●

WEAPONS IN SPACE: THE HIGH RISK FRONTIER

HON. DON EDWARDS

OF CALIFORNIA

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, today the House begins consideration of the first budget resolution for fiscal year 1985. What we as Members must come to grips with is a Federal deficit which is continuing to grow at a phenomenal rate, with no sign of real reduction even under the new budget proposed by the administration. One of the major causes of this spiralling deficit is the huge increase proposed for the military budget.

I have enclosed for your information the last two editorials in a series from the San Jose Mercury News, dealing with the military budget, and in particular the space weapons program. I hope that this information will be helpful in our attempt to get the Federal deficit and Federal spending under control.

The editorials follow:

[From the San Jose Mercury News, Feb. 16, 1984]

DREAMS AND DOLLARS

Laser-armed craft keep a silent vigil in space, cruising for defensive purposes only, ready to smash from on high any offensive missile launched to start a nuclear war.

That was the dream evoked by President Reagan's "star wars" speech 11 months ago. Whether or not it can be realized, technologically and militarily, remains very much in doubt. But on Jan. 6, Reagan signed National Security Decision Directive No. 119, setting in motion a stepped-up research and development program. And the fiscal year 1985 defense budget now proposes to turn the dream into reality at least in one important sense—the enormous expense of that R&D effort.

The search for a defense against enemy missiles has been underway in American laboratories and think-tanks since the 1950s. Reagan has not so much begun a new enterprise as move an old one to higher priority than it enjoyed before.

And to higher cost: In fiscal year 1982, funding for the broad category called strategic defense—which includes jet fighter interceptors, antisatellite weapon research, civil defense and other programs—was $2.6 billion in current dollars. In the fiscal year 1985 budget, the administration is asking $4 billion; its projection $12 billion for fiscal year 1989. Much of that dramatic increase is to support research on various defenses against enemy missiles; some schemes are called anti-ballistic missile (ABM) programs, others are called ballistic missile defense (BMD).

Programs loosely identified as the president's "star wars" package account for $1.7 billion in the fiscal year 1985 budget Congress will consider this spring. But at least another $400 million is requested for other directed-energy research, and the Defense Department is asking an additional $650 million for other BMD programs.

These are not enormous sums, by Pentagon standards. The administration is attemption, at this point, to increase present spending for such research by 25 to 50 percent. But it's the start of a pipeline that would swallow many more dollars in the near future. A presidentially-commissioned study puts the five year research cost at $18 billion to $27 billion; the same study estimated that to actually build a space-based defensive system could cost $92 billion, and others place the price far higher.

Critics point out that the all-time peak for U.S. strategic defense spending came in 1957, when $9.5 billion went largely for procurement of a great many fighter planes and missiles. In the projected FY 89 budget, $9.5 billion is proposed for R&D alone. Almost certainly coming along behind all of that research and development will be enormous pressures to spend gigantic sums on building something.

What's particularly troubling is that this ambitious financial gamble is proposed in the absence of any scientific breakthroughs to suggest that the proposed programs will ever actually work. "I know of no prospect for such technology," says Stanford physicist Sydney Drell, a high-level adviser to previous administrations on defense issues.

"The proposal is totally unfounded," declares MIT physicist Kosta Tsipis. "It is a cruel hoax."

Many people have assumed that in the "star wars" speech, the president was talking about protecting the American population; certainly he encouraged that inference, with sweeping language about "eliminating the threat posed by strategic nuclear missiles," and about "changing the course of human history."

In fact, even scientists generally allied with the administration question whether an ABM defense could protect people. But there is strong sentiment, within the defense establishment, for ABMs to protect our own land-based missiles. There is a possibility that much of the proposed ABM research in reality will search for ways to guard the MX, effectively adding to that questionable weapon's already enormous cost.

Even so, its impact on the defense budget is only part of the problem posed by the star wars R&D program. It may never stop an enemy missile, but it could shoot one of the only viable arms control agreements ever devised.

WHAT'S A TREATY WORTH?

Missiles are easier to defend than cities.

Last March, in what has come to be called his "star wars" speech, President Reagan evoked visions of a space-based defensive system that might someday protect the entire nation from nuclear attack.

But in the foreseeable future, it is much more likely that the anti-ballistic missile (ABM) research now proposed to implement that dream will turn to the more prosaic task of trying to protect American land-based missiles.

There are serious questions about the technical feasibility of even that more limited mission; some scientists liken the notion of knocking down incoming enemy missiles with our own missiles to "trying to shoot a bullet with a bullet." And even supposing that the technology could work, ABM defense, noble as it seems in concept, might in actual practice make the world more dangerous.

Critics contend that if the United States deployed such defensive systems, the Soviet Union almost certainly would augment its present offensive arsenal. Beyond that, the Soviets would doubtless deploy defensive systems of their own on a wide scale, developing weapons to shoot down our ballistic missiles and bombers. Then what would be our deterrent?

This would not necessarily put the Soviets ahead, since their deterrent would be in doubt as well. But the resulting confusion would shake up the strategic balance and create a far more volatile situation for both sides, with the arms race then accelerating on two tracks, one offensive, one defensive—and neither making anyone more secure.

Meanwhile, the mere testing and development of ABM systems would have undercut a treaty that for 14 years has functioned—not flawlessly, but with some tangible success—to stabilize the competition in nuclear weapons.

Signed as part of the SALT I accords in 1972, the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty limits the United States and U.S.S.R. to one ABM system each. The Soviets deployed theirs around Moscow, and still maintain it. The U.S. system, built at Grand Forks, N.D., to guard an ICBM complex, has since been deactivated because of general agreement that it was an impractical idea.

By limiting the superpowers to these two token ABM efforts, the treaty has left retaliatory forces on both sides relatively unchallenged, which at least theoretically reinforces the concept of deterrence and makes war less likely.

Along with the SALT I limitation of offensive weapons systems, the ABM treaty is one of the only tangible products of years of arms control negotiations. For American supporters of the arms control process, it also has symbolic value—proof that agreements with the Soviets are viable.

The president and his key advisers have never expressed any enthusiasm for the SALT process. They are careful to say that the ABM research now proposed in the fiscal year 1985 defense budget would not violate the ABM treaty. But while the research itself would not, the weapons it foreshadows could not be tested and developed, much less deployed, without abrogating the treaty or amending it beyond recognition. Thus the signal to the Soviets must read something like this: We're not violating the treaty yet; but we're preparing to do so in the future.

Some of the administration's critics believe the Reagan people would like to undercut the treaty politically. They think this desire is what led the administration recently to accuse the Soviets of building a new radar that could be part of a future ABM system, and thus may violate the treaty. Whatever their motives, Reagan's people claim they see a pattern suggesting that the Soviets may someday suddenly "break out" of the agreement.

At this point the supposed evidence of Soviet cheating is open to conflicting interpretations. But the Reagan administration, by proposing weapons that would violate the treaty on our side, almost certainly is pushing the Soviets in the same direction.

That ought not be the case. The ABM treaty, like the deterrence theory it supports, is imperfect. But it certainly should not be scrapped in favor of a new two-track arms race. The United States should adhere to the treaty. And whatever leverage we exert on the Soviets should pressure them to abide by it as well.

But for that to occur, Congress will have to exert pressure on the Reagan administration, which seems to be moving in just the opposite direction. In the House, Democrats including George Brown of California are expected to push this spring for a reaffirmation of U.S. support for the treaty, probably in the form of a joint resolution.

But the bottom line, for most Congress members and for most other Americans, probably will be dollars.

The federal deficit is $180 billion. The Reagan administration is proposing fiscal year 1985 military budget authority of $305 billion, the highest since World War II. If enacted, that would continue a military spending expansion of 85 percent over the decade.

It is widely acknowledged that defense spending must be slowed. And by cutting weapons programs now entering the pipeline, Congress could make substantial progress toward cutting future deficits.

The enlarged anti-satellite and ABM programs are prime candidates. Some research in each area certainly is prudent, but at the level envisioned in the Reagan budget, these programs go far beyond that. They serve no clearly defined military need. They work against arms control treaties. They augur new manifestations of the arms race. They could contaminate space with active weapons for the first time, and in a manner that would be irrevocable.

They cost too much, in all of these ways, and any Congress member who claims to support economy, and then votes for these programs, should be forced to explain the contradiction.●

THIRD WORLD COUNTRIES OFFER OPPORTUNITY FOR U.S. FARM EXPORT GROWTH

HON. DOUG BEREUTER

OF NEBRASKA

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, next year, the Congress will be called upon to reauthorize our Nation's farm programs. In the past, I have suggested that an integral part of the effort must be the formulation of a comprehensive agricultural trade policy.

In anticipation of that effort, I thought that I should share with my colleagues the following article which appeared in the recent issue of Co-op Country News. That piece underscored a concept I believe must be one of the building blocks of that agricultural trade policy: utilization of the interrelationship of Third World economic development and U.S. agricultural export sales.

I hope that all of my colleagues in the House will read this article. I believe that it provides valuable insight into how we can meet a multitude of worthwhile domestic and international goals simultaneously.

THIRD WORLD COUNTRIES OFFER OPPORTUNITY FOR U.S. FARM EXPORT GROWTH

(By James C. Webster)

Throughout the 1970s, agricultural exports were the name of the game in farming, especially for grain, cotton and soybean growers.

From 1977 to 1981 alone, U.S. farm exports nearly doubled—from $23.9 billion worth to $40.5 billion. And there were heady predictions that the export boom would soon top $100 billion.

But something happened on the way to that goal. Exports started falling, not increasing. By 1983 they'd dropped to $34.8 billion; this year the government expects a rebound to $37.5 billion, but some USDA analysts privately say that's too optimistic.

The seasons for the collapse have been detailed often: 1) the strength of the dollar, which makes our commodities more expensive in importing country currency even as grain prices here are low; 2) recession in most parts of the world, reducing buying power; 3) staggering financial problems in developing countries, which lack the money to import the food they would like; and 4) competition from other exporting nations, especially subsidized European Community farm exports.

While politicians and farm leaders alike can agree on the causes of the problem, they're far from united on how to solve it.

The solutions advanced most often are to cut the U.S. price support loan rate (backers of that idea say it will make U.S. grain and cotton more competitive) and to increase government credit programs to finance exports.

Critics of those approaches argue that it does little good to sell more U.S. farm products overseas if the price does not give the farmer a fair return, and that added credit only postpones the problem because many countries can't afford to repay the loans.

Comes now a third approach—one that may have little short-term promise but which, over the years, may mean far more export growth for American agriculture.

A new "Council on World Hunger, Development and Trade," funded by the U.S. Agency for International Development, just this month undertook a large-scale educational effort to show the relationship between economic development in poor countries and U.S. agricultural export sales.

"As a poor country develops and increases its purchasing power," says the council, "it buys more food in the world market—and especially from the United States."

There is a lot of evidence to back up that claim. Over the years, Taiwan and South Korea have been cited as the examples of countries which have made the transition from poor, developing nations to thriving importers of U.S. farm products.

Not too many years ago, both depended heavily on U.S. foreign assistance and food aid. But the economies of both nations grew rapidly, creating not only income but more nutritious diets that required food beyond what they could produce themselves.

Last year, Korea bought $1.713 billion in U.S. farm products on the commercial market, Taiwan $1.236 billion—up 6 to 7 percent in a year when many other countries were buying less.

Both are major feed grain and wheat buyers; in addition, Korea buys U.S. rice and cotton. That makes Korea our fifth biggest customer. Taiwan is No. 7.

But these are not the only examples of third world countries that are important customers for U.S. farm exports—a new example comes as a surprise to many Washington agricultural watchers, offering evidence that what once seemed to be a competitor of U.S. farmers also can be a significant customer.

It is Malaysia, where economic growth rates averaged 8 percent during the 1970s, ahead of most low-income countries.

Malaysian imports of U.S. food products jumped from less than $30 million in 1976 to nearly $140 million by 1982.

"It is worth remembering," says Harvard political scientist Robert Paarlberg, "that Malaysian economic development was at one time viewed as a threat to U.S. agriculture, owing to the rapid growth of that nation's palm oil industry, seemingly in competition with U.S. soybean producers.

"But now, as it turns out, Malaysia's growing need for feedstuffs has brought some offsetting advantages for U.S. soybean growers," he points out. "Malaysia's infant soybean crushing industry, begun in 1980, now buys roughly two-thirds of its beans for the U.S."

Although Malaysia's palm kernel meal is abundant, USDA says it's too fibrous and lacks essential nutrients to sustain efficient poultry and swine growth. The result: in fiscal 1982, soybeans worth $36 million was the leading U.S. farm export to that southeast Asian nation.

How did Malaysia achieve such rapid income growth and become a significant customer of U.S. agriculture?

One reason is its booming palm oil industry, the object of widespread concern in U.S. agriculture just five years ago.

Palm oil development was funded by credit from the World Bank, and it created a major agricultural political stir in the late 1970s.

Concerned that palm oil would displace soybean oil, U.S. growers mounted a major lobbying effort behind an amendment in Congress to require the United States to oppose loans by the World Bank and other multilateral development agencies to countries seeking to develop oilseed production.

The amendment also covered citrus and sugar, whose U.S. growers were fearful of competition.

Fortunately for U.S. soybean growers, as it developed, they were not successful in stopping World Bank funding for that part of Malaysia's economic development program.

E. A. Jaenke, a former governor of the Farm Credit Administration who is the coordinator of the world hunger, development and trade project, sees a natural linkage between the poor countries that want to afford food and the American farmer who wants to export it at a profit.

"Since World War II," he points out, "U.S. agricultural marketing efforts have focused primarily on about 20 industrialized economies," largely western Europe and Japan.

"But exports to those countries have now slowed, and it is increasingly evident that the future growth opportunities lie with the other 94 countries—those classified by the Word Bank as low and middle income countries," Jaenke says.

Those countries—many of them in Africa, Latin America and southeast Asia—"offer U.S. farmers their best opportunity for renewed export growth," Jaenke says, "but only if incomes are increased for those countries."

That raises the bottom-line question: how can those countries increase their incomes to the point that they buy the feed grain and protein that the U.S. can export more efficiently than other exporters?

For one thing, says Harvard's Paarlberg, many of the countries themselves must learn that it is essential first to develop their rural areas and get rid of "urban biased, or otherwise narrow-based development plans."

For another, U.S. policy must recognize that it is essential to buy the exports of these countries, such as textiles and sugar, so they will have the dollars to buy our goods in return, he points out.

Third, the United States should help rebuild the "tottering U.S.-third world financial structures," the multilateral lending agencies which have been starved of development funds by U.S. (and other industrialized countires') unwillingness to fund them adequately, says Paarlberg.

"U.S. agriculturalists, whose interests will be among those most generously served by rapid and broadbased third world development," he wrote recently, "should in their own interest become more vocal and more visible advocates . . . of policy initiatives in manufactured trade, finance, and monetary exchange better suited to the current needs of U.S. agriculture and third world development."

This year marks the 30th anniversary of the creation of the U.S. Food for Peace Program—the most generous single example of food aid in the world's history—and the 10th anniversary of the landmark 1974 World Food Conference in Rome.

Americans and others were riveted then by television accounts of massive hunger and starvation, a problem that is no less severe today than it was in 1974.

Whether the food needs of millions in low-income developing countries and the parallel needs of American farmers facing their third year of low prices can come together to forge a solution is the sixty-four-billion-dollar question of the 1980s.●

HISPANICS' POLITICAL STAR ASCENDING

HON. RONALD D. COLEMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the history of America vividly chronicles the rise of one wave of immigrants after another that achieves economic, social, and political power. The most recent chapter of this story has been captured by the recent Washington Post article "Hispanics' Political Star Ascending," which details the significant impact that newly registered Hispanic voters will have on the 1984 election.

The article follows:

[From the Washington Post, Mar. 25, 1984]

(By Haynes Johnson and Thomas B. Edsall)

SAN ANTONIO.—After the daily noon mass at St. Timothy's in the heart of Mexican-American housing projects on the west side, Delia Lucio stood inside the church vestibule passing out white "power cards." In a few minutes, she had registered 15 new voters.

"I'm going door to door, to clinics, wherever I see people," she said. "The people want to vote. They want to vote Democrat. They know that under the Reagan administration they have suffered badly. I say, well, maybe it's not all Reagan's fault, but maybe it is. I don't know.

"They say, 'This winter, we were very cold.' They paid $150 electricity, $100 rent. What did they have left over to eat? The cuts made it worse and worse. So they come to me and say, 'I want to vote.' "

Lucio, a housewife and mother of eight children, is not a political activist in the traditional sense. But she represents a critical factor in the presidential politics of 1984.

In Texas, a vital state for the Democrats if they are to regain the White House, the path to victory lies in the ability of people like Lucio to produce a record turnout of Mexican-American voters in November.

But beyond the clear stakes in this electoral battle lies another, greater political story. It is an old, familiar American one—the rise of immigrant groups to political influence and power.

Now, it's the turn of the Hispanic voters—traditionally more passive and less involved in politics—to follow the path set long before by Irish, Poles, Italians and, more recently, blacks.

Like Americans who trace their origins to Europe, Africa and Asia, Hispanics in fact are not monolithic but culturally and historically diverse—Mexican Americans, Puerto Ricans, Cuban Americans and other peoples with roots in Central and South America and parts of the Caribbean. Yet together they constitute a significant, and increasing, political power, and this election promises to demonstrate their full emergence.

Willie Velasquez, director of the Southwest Voter Registration Education Project, the foremost organization tracking the rapidly changing Hispanic voting population, puts it this way:

"The 1984 election is an excellent time to inaugurate a new era. We used to be concerned about paving streets. Now, for the balance of this decade, we're going to be concerned about U.S. public policy questions.

"After this election people are going to learn about us. The reason we can talk that way is we did our homework at the local level, and that strong political base will produce for us. For us, this is the real beginning of the '80s. For us, the decade starts now."

Hispanics already have rising national political stars, including San Antonio Mayor Henry G. Cisneros and New Mexico Gov. Toney Anaya, both Democrats. Their numbers in Congress are also rising, and should continue to do so with the increase in power at local and state levels.

Hispanic leaders believe history is on their side. They are America's fastest-growing minority and the youngest in median age. With new immigrants arriving daily, and prospect for changes in national immigration policy to permit more Hispanics to become citizens, and thus eligible voters, the Hispanic vote seems destined to assume even greater weight.

Hispanics already are a significant voting bloc in the Southwest—Texas, New Mexico, Colorado, Arizona and California—as well as in New York, New Jersey, Florida and Illinois. But their enormous voting potential has barely been tapped. In 1980, there were 6.6 million Hispanic citizens of voting age, but only an estimated 2.2 million cast ballots. Non-voting Hispanic citizens included 1.1 million in California, 1.05 million in Texas, 467,000 in New York and 206,000 in Florida.

Texas stands as the preeminent example of what can be done. The increase in registration alone has been startling. In 1978 there were 591,950 registered Mexican-American voters here. Four years later, there were 832,000—a 41 percent increase in four years. Nor is the pace likely to slow. At the present rate, the Mexican-American population in Texas will double in 20 years, compared with a doubling of blacks in 33 years and whites in 50 years.

Voting also is rising sharply. In 1976, Mexican Americans cast 278,000 votes in Texas. Four years later, the turnout was 415,000. This year, with the greatest voter registration drive under way in Mexican-American communities ranging from the big urban centers like San Antonio to rural farm areas stretching across South Texas, the expectation is that 660,000 Mexican Americans will vote.

"Of these, I expect Republicans to get about 15 percent, and it may be as low as 10 percent," Velasquez said.

Republicans, acutely aware of the implications of those figures, are working aggressively to win a larger share in Texas. They say they think President Reagan's popularity will enable them to get as much as 30 percent of traditionally Democratic Hispanic voters.

On the national level, the Republicans are mounting a well-financed crisply organized effort employing the latest computer technology to identify new Reagan voters and get them to the polls next fall.

The national GOP campaign aims at wealthier Hispanics, business executives, veterans and present members of the armed forces. It's especially effective among Cuban-American voters in Florida, where Reagan stirs fervent emotions and voters say their militant anti-communist feelings count more than economic problems when they decide how to cast their presidential ballots. Still, Cuban Americans, who are only 6.8 percent of the nation's Hispanic voters, are dwarfed in numbers and political potential by Mexican Americans.

From 1964 through 1980, Republicans made steady gains among Hispanic voters here and nationwide, capturing 25 percent of that electorate in the last presidential election. It appeared that Reagan's courting of Hispanics was cutting into that traditional Democratic constituency. But two years into his presidency. Hispanic voters turned sharply against him. In the 1982 congressional elections, GOP Hispanic support nationally plummeted to 16 percent and in Texas sank to 7 percent.

Texas Republicans remember vividly what happened just two years ago. A rising tide of Mexican-American voters sounded a bell in the night for the GOP in Texas and set off alarms in the Reagan White House.

The combination of the recession and the rapid increase in Mexican-American turnout defeated the powerful Republican governor, Bill Clements, and put Democrat Mark White in the statehouse.

White won by 231,575 votes. Mexican-Americans gave him 232,379 more votes than they gave Clements.

They represented the margin of victory, and set the stage for the intense voter registration and turnout drive in this presidential election.

"Reagan is very popular with Hispanics middle class and up, definitely," said Byron Nelson of the Texas State Republican Party. "But let's not be unrealistic. He's not going to win majorities. Reagan didn't carry any of south Texas in 1980, and that's the poor, lower-income people in those counties. It is something we are very, very concerned about. Obviously, if we see giant growth trends, then we worry."

At GOP county headquarters here there was no attempt to minimize the difficulty of the presidential effort in Texas. "I think it will be toe to toe," said Brenda Hassel, Republican voter registration chairman for Bexar County.

She added that she had been impressed after seeing how the Southwest Voter Registration Education Project headquarter office in San Antonio was carrying out its massive drive among Mexican Americans. "I was a little sobered," she said, "and wondered whether we would be rolled over by a steamroller."

Republicans acknowledge that they have serious difficulties with Hispanics.

"People come up and ask, 'Why is it that when we go to Republican meetings, we seldom spot a minority face?' " GOP county chairman Knox Duncan said. "If you ask me why the party of Lincoln attracts fewer minorities, I explain that it's a middle-class type party."

Whether 1984 will mark the beginning of a new era of Hispanic political power and influence, as Velasquez believes, remains to be proved on Election Day. But there's no doubt that even at this early stage, an intensive effort is being made to produce the greatest turnout ever and that it already is generating new emotion and enthusiasm. When the Southwest Voter Registration Education Project began a registration drive recently in the valley, 2,000 people showed up in a pouring rain.

Here in San Antonio a number of organizations are coordinating volunteer door-to-door registration efforts at nights and on weekends in the poorer areas of the city. Their goal for San Antonio alone is to register 20,000 new voters between now and the Texas primary on May 5. After that, the goal is to add another 20,000 before the presidential election.

Whatever the future may hold for Mexican-American voters, the present revolves around old problems of poverty, social justice and growing disparities between economic haves and have-nots. That is particularly true among Mexican Americans in south Texas, who were hit severely last winter by harsh weather conditions that ruined crops and raised heating and other bills.

Those conditions bear directly on the election and voter turnout efforts.

"This election is extremely important," said Father Tim McCluskey, associate pastor of St. Timothy's, a former missionary in South America and presently coordinator of the voter registration campaign for one of the groups here, San Antonio Communities Organized for Public Service.

"For years, San Antonio has been a cheap labor town where people are underemployed or unemployed. I got into this because of the whole question of violence, which came from frustration and unemployment. In the 14 months I've been in Texas, I've buried 23 young people.

"So the issue of jobs and education are forefront in our parish. These are the issues we constantly talk about when we look not only at state elections but national elections."

Sonia C. Hernandez, president of the community organization, also sees the Hispanic voter effort in this area as crucial in November.

"One of our state politicians has said the valley will make the difference in the 1984 presidential election. We extend that. We say south Texas will make the difference."●

THE UNITED STATES MUST NOT DEAL WITH THE PLO

HON. GARY L. ACKERMAN

OF NEW YORK

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, it is with a great sense of personal sadness that I take this opportunity to insert in the RECORD, a copy of an article in the New York Times on April 3, concerning the recent attack committed by PLO terrorists against innocent civilians in Jerusalem. I visited Israel in December, and I had the chance to observe firsthand the fear of terrorism which these brave people must constantly endure. It is incomprehensible to me that while Israelis must live from day to day knowing that they may be subject to another outburst of terrorist violence, there are forces in the United States calling for extention of recognition to the PLO. Even more disturbing is the fact that the present administration has seen fit to authorize some 400 hours of negotiations with this heinous group.

At this time, I would also like to insert into the RECORD a copy of a recent letter I sent to Secretary of State Shultz asking for a clarification of American policy toward the PLO. Once and for all, the Congress and the American people must be told if this administration is ready to deviate from our memorandum of understanding with Israel concerning the PLO, or whether we will uphold our commitment not to deal with this organization until they recognize Israel's right to exist and renounce terrorism as a means of obtaining their objectives. After reading the article in today's New York Times, it is difficult to conceive of any conditions at all under which the United States should ever deal with this bunch of unconscionable terrorists.

THREE ARABS WITH GUNS AND GRENADES WOUND 48 IN JERUSALEM CROWDS

(By David K. Shipler)

JERUSALEM, April 2.—Three Arabs armed with guns and grenades attacked crowds of shoppers in the heart of Jerusalem today, wounding 48 people, one of them critically.

Israeli storekeepers and pedestrians pulled pistols, chased one of the terrorists and fatally wounded him. The two others were caught, the police said.

Some officials said the attack, near the central downtown intersection on the Jewish side of the city, was the most brazen terrorist action in the city in memory. Bombs have been planted in the city, but it has not been the target of the kind of guerrilla assaults that have taken place in other parts of Israel and in the West Bank.

"This is different from any other incident," Rahamim Comfort, the Jerusalem district police chief, said.

It was the third major terrorist attack in Jerusalem in recent months. On Dec. 6, a bus was demolished by a bomb, killing 6 people and wounding 41. On Feb. 28, two grenades, planted outside a clothing store on Jaffa Road, wounded 21.

In Damascus, a radical Palestinian group, the Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine, telephoned the Reuters news agency with a statement taking responsibility for todays attack.

A WILD ASSAULT

It said its men had stormed the Ministries of Tourism and of Commerce and Industry, taken two ministers hostage and were demanding the release of Palestinian prisoners. None of that happened, although the attack took place just down the street from the Ministry of Tourism.

If that was the objective, the operation seemed ill-planned and practically suicidal, according to officials and witnesses. The fragmentary accounts, pieced together, gave a picture of a wild, almost panicky assault and a gun battle that several Israelis likened to "the wild West."

It began shortly before 10 A.M. The weather, warm and sunny, had brought hundreds of people onto King George Street to stroll and shop. The sidewalks were thick with crowds.

The three men came from Lebanon, a police spokesman said. Interior Minister Yosef Burg said they might have come from elsewhere.

The three drove in a rented car this morning down King George Street, stopping about 50 yards from the intersection with Jaffa Road, the hub of West Jerusalem. Witnesses said that at least one was dressed elegantly.

One stayed in the car while the other two, in their early 20's, entered the Habira sporting goods store. Speaking Arabic-accented English, they asked to try on some jeans, the owner said.

"They asked to go to the dressing room," Rani Cohen, a young man who works there, said. "I showed them where the dressing room was, and they went in, and I stood near the room."

THEY EMERGE WITH WEAPONS

Then they suddenly emerged, one brandishing grenades, the other carrying what the police described as a small Czechoslovak submachine gun. He put the gun to Mr. Cohen's head and said in English, "don't move."

The terrorist was about the same age as Mr. Cohen. "I exchanged glances with him," Mr. Cohen told an Israeli television reporter. "For a few seconds he looked at me and I looked at him, and suddenly, it was as if he passed me up, and he pushed me aside, as if he didn't want to kill me."

Someone outside may have spotted them and alarmed them, the owner said. They rushed into the middle of the street, one shooting, the other throwing grenades. Many Israelis are licensed to carry pistols, and when the attack began, the guns came out of belts and holsters. At least three civilians, perhaps half a dozen, fired on the assailants. A soldier passing by joined in, as did some policemen.

Yishai Cohen, who has a clothing store on King George Street, heard the shooting, went out and saw one attacker being chased by civilians.

ONE TERRORIST IS SHOT

"One of them, Larry Tsach, who owns a jewelry shop next to me, hit him," he said. "He fell in the middle of the road, and next to him fell a canvas bag which he carried with him. He was lying for about a minute or two. And then suddenly he rose up, and his face was covered with blood, blood was also on the road. He had his hand in a fist, he cursed, he bent down, he took out a hand grenade, a yellow color, out of his bag."

The wounded man, grenade, in hand and blood streaming down his face, ran toward Jaffa Road.

"I shot at him," said Eli Cohen, a 35-year-old insurance agent with an office on King George. But the terrorist kept running, disappearing behind a bus that was standing in the street.

"I ran behind the bus, and he turned toward me," Mr. Cohen said. "We ran toward each other, and I hit him on the head and the grenade he was holding fell, and I shouted, 'Grenade!' and ran."

"I hid on the other side of the bus," he said, "but apparently that wasn't enough because I was hit by shrapnel." As for the terrorist, "He didn't shout anything. It looked like he was in a trance, as if he didn't care about bullets or anything."

He died later. A second man was captured by border troops just up Jaffa Road, the police said, and a third was caught at a roadblock at the edge of Jerusalem, trying to drive toward Bethlehem. There were unconfirmed reports from witnesses that a blond woman had also stepped out of the car with the three men and was seen being taken into custody.

The police said four grenades were thrown, all Soviet-made.

TOURISTS AMONG THE WOUNDED

Of the 48 people wounded, one was listed in critical condition and 34 were treated and released from hospitals by evening. Among those caught in the melee was a group of Finnish tourists, at least five of whom were hurt.

"We will do everything so that such attacks are not repeated," Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir said in a radio interview. "The perpetrators and their dispatchers will be punished to the full extent of the law."

Mayor Teddy Kollek of Jerusalem attributed the attack partly to the international climate, including the proposal in Congress to move the United States Embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem.

Although he favors moving the embassy, Mayor Kollek said, "The fact that the problem of Jerusalem has come up in the Congress of the United States, that arguments over relations with Jordan and other neighboring countries probably encourage terrorist organizations to more actions to prove that they exist, that they want to express their opposition to any constructive way to dealing with the problem of Israel."

In a bookstore on Jaffa Road, browsers stopped and stood silently, listening to the radio news. In a quiet camera shop, a customer asked the old proprietor, "When is this going to stop?"

"Never," said the old man.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
SEVENTH DISTRICT, NEW YORK,
March 29, 1984.

Hon. GEORGE SHULTZ,
Secretary of State,
State Department, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I am writing to request a clarification of the Administration's policy regarding the Palestine Liberation Organization. As you know, under the terms of a Memorandum of Understanding (MOU) between our country and Israel, in effect since 1975, the United States has agreed not to "recognize or negotiate with the Palestine Liberation Organization so long as the Palestine Liberation Organization does not recognize Israel's right to exist and does not accept Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338." As we all know, the PLO has not yet complied with any of these requirements. Yet, the Reagan Administration has conducted extensive negotiations with the PLO, consisting of more than 50 meetings lasting 400 hours. From this evidence, it is clear that the U.S. has violated our MOU with Israel on this matter.

Even more disturbing is the testimony provided recently to the House Subcommittee on Europe and the Middle East on March 21 by Assistant Secretary of State Richard Murphy. Although the MOU is quite explicit in prohibiting recognition or negotiations with the PLO unless certain conditions are met, it appears that Mr. Murphy is seeking to establish a new category, "contacts," under which negotiations between the United States and the PLO may occur. Mr. Secretary, it seems that our Nation is involved in an act of unilateral revisionism concerning our solemn agreement with Israel on the Palestine Liberation Organization.

At this time, I would appreciate from the Administration a clarification of its position on this issue for the Congress and the American people. Is it United States policy to abide by the 1975 Memorandum of Understanding with Israel, or is the Administration prepared to deviate from this agreement, as Mr. Murphy's testimony would indicate? The answer to this question will help clear up the ambiguities in American policy which have been created by the disclosure of the Administration's extensive contacts with the PLO, as well as by the Assistant Secretary's recent testimony before Congress.

Thank you for your attention to this matter. I look forward to hearing from you.

Sincerely,

GARY L. ACKERMAN,
Member of Congress.●

GEORGETOWN HOYAS WIN NCAA CHAMPIONSHIP

HON. WALTER E. FAUNTROY

OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Speaker, on Monday, April 2, 1984, the Georgetown University Hoyas defeated the University of Houston Cougars for the National Collegiate Athletic Association basketball championship by the score of 84 to 75.

I am particularly pleased because Georgetown University is located in the District of Columbia and a number of the players on the basketball team are products of the District of Columbia public schools.

Mr. Speaker, in celebrating this victory I would like to make three points. First, under the leadership of Coach John Thompson the Georgetown basketball program has improved tremendously in the last 12 years. Coach Thompson continuously produces teams which emphasize togetherness in all aspects of the game.

Second, Coach Thompson is actually an educator/coach. In the last few years we have been subjected to stories about black athletes who have been used by coaches without attention to their educational needs. Coach Thompson's program at Georgetown places special emphasis on obtaining a college degree. In his 12 years of coaching, Mr. Thompson has recruited 45 players of whom 43 have graduated.

Third, Coach Thompson's program also emphasizes protection of the athletes from undue and unnecessary over-attention by the media. He has been criticized heavily by the media for "Hoya Paranoia." Yet, many failed to understand that Coach Thompson recognizes that these college athletes are students first and not objects to be exploited and sensationalized for commerical purposes.

I congratulate Coach Thompson, the players, the Georgetown University community, alumni, and friends for this tremendous victory.●

IRA GALLAWAY AND EL SALVADOR

HON. ROBERT H. MICHEL

OF ILLINOIS

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, Rev. Ira Gallaway, pastor of the First United Methodist Church in Peoria, Ill., was a member of the U.S. delegation which observed the recent elections in El Salvador. Dr. Gallaway, who has previously visited that country, was very impressed by the people of El Salvador and their desire for democratic government and peace. I think all our colleagues would benefit by reading an account of his observations, as published in the Peoria Journal Star.

At this time, I wish to insert in the RECORD, "Elections Stand for Moderation" by Elaine Hopkins, from the Peoria Journal Star, March 29, 1984.

ELECTIONS STAND FOR MODERATION

(By Elaine Hopkins)

Sunday's election in El Salvador represented "a definite 'no' to the extremism of the right and left," says the Rev. Ira Gallaway, pastor of the First United Methodist Church of Peoria.

Dr. Gallaway was part of a U.S. State Department delegation observing the election. The 31-member group arrived in El Salvador Saturday and left Monday after visiting seven municipalities Sunday to observe the voting.

"We talked to people directly. We had many conversations" with all sorts of people, Gallaway said.

Everywhere people told him, "We're here to vote for freedom, we're here to vote for democracy, we want peace," Gallaway said.

Delegation members were able to leave the group and talk to people independently and privately, he said. "We talked to old people, young people, middle-aged people. You can tell whether they're being forced to do something," the minister said.

Though citizens are required to vote in El Salvador, "people said no punitive measures were taken against those who didn't vote," he said.

People seemed to be committed to democratic processes, Gallaway said. "One woman told me she walked (14 miles) and stood three hours in line" to vote. "It's worth it. It's for freedom and peace," Gallaway said the woman told him.

He said he received the impression "the leftists do not control the mind of the people." He visited with labor leaders and others, and everywhere people said they opposed military dictatorship and did not want to go back to an oligarchy or a government run by wealthy intesests. But they are also opposed to Marxist rule involving state control, he said.

Gallaway said he saw "bureaucratic bungling" and problems with a U.S.-supplied computer which was supposed to aid in voting. But the committee unanimously agreed the election was a "step towards possible democratic rule in El Salvador," he said.

"There's no insurance that peace is going to come to that country. This is a step in their possible democratic future."

Gallaway said he saw no indication of vote fraud. Every ballot box was watched by representatives of all eight political parties, and they were "watching each other with apparent good humor," he said.

Leftists boycotted the election, saying "they would have exposed themselves" to reprisals, he said.

"I hope people of this country are aware of how precious freedom is," he said. People here take such processes as voting for granted, and many do not bother to leave their comfortable homes to vote, he said. But in El Salvador, "I see people struggling to gain freedom," he said. There is "a great commitment on the part of many people to voting."

Gallaway has been on a speaking tour in Michigan, but plans to arrive in Peoria today.●

THE LATE HONORABLE CLARENCE MITCHELL, JR.

HON. E de la GARZA

OF TEXAS

Tuesday, March 27, 1984

● Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, today we gather to respectfully pay tribute to Clarence M. Mitchell, Jr.—distinguished brother of our House colleague PARREN MITCHELL of Maryland.

Mere words can do little to convey the significance of Clarence Mitchell's contributions to the strides made in the area of civil rights over the past 25 years. As a lifelong champion of equality Mr. Mitchell played a prominent role in passage of the Fair Housing Act of 1968, a landmark piece of 1960's legislation.

Serving as the chief Washington lobbyist for the NAACP for nearly three decades, Mr. Mitchell was a man respected by both Democrats and Republicans. Mr. Mitchell believed in working as extensively as possible through existing legislation having said "when you have a law you have an instrument that will work for you permanently but when you branch out on a separate line of direct action, you may wind up with nothing."

What he is really saying is that in unity there is strength. United we stand.

Clarence Mitchell's past achievements will serve as a warm and glowing testimonial of his energy and vision of a better America. He has carved a place in history and the monument to him is a massive one. He will be sorely missed.

To his family and relatives I extend my deepest condolences and prayers.●

WHERE'S THE PROGRESS ON CYPRUS?

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, let me take this occasion to voice my deep concern about the lack of significant progress on the Cyprus issue. Unless some real headway is made in the next few months, I believe that Congress will be ready, willing, and able to cut military aid to Turkey. Although I regret that such action may be necessary, something must be done to remedy the current tragic situation on that island.

As all of you know, Turkish troops invaded Cyprus nearly 10 years ago. During the intervening years, families were separated from one another. Over 200,000 refugees have been forced from their homes and villages. Approximately 40 percent of the island is under Turkish Cypriot control, thereby depriving the native Cypriots of self-determination. This forced occupation of that lovely island has imposed a political hardship on the people of Cyprus. It has also enacted a heavy economic, social, and cultural burden as well.

From a strategic perspective, the United States has legitimate concerns. At the very time that the Soviet Union is enhancing its power in the Mediterranean, NATO's southern flank is weakened by the Greek-Turkish dispute over Cyprus. U.S. bases in Greece and Turkey have, in the past, been threatened with removal unless the conflict in Cyprus is resolved.

With nearly 20,000 regular Turkish troops on the northern part of the island, the Turkish Government is violating the 1959 Treaty of Guarantee which was designed to insure the sovereignty of Cyprus. The agreement limits the number of Turkish troops to 650. In addition, the vulnerable 1,200 mile land and sea border between Turkey and the Soviet Union is being neglected with the drawdown of those Turkish troops for redeployment to that tiny island. In short, our entire defense posture in Southern Europe and the Middle East is in jeopardy.

More recently, northern Cyprus just unilaterally declared itself an independent Turkish-Cypriot republic separate from the Greek-Cypriot majority on the strategic Mediterranean island. I was angered and saddened by the shortsightedness and insensitivity of this illegal action. This is not the way to solve the problem.

All of my colleagues are aware of the other body's recent action concerning Turkey. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee tentatively voted to withhold assistance from Turkey unless it pulls its troops out of Cyprus. I believe that the House would be fully justified in proposing similar restrictions on assistance to Turkey unless significant progress is made on the volatile Cyprus issue in the near future. Surely the Turkish Government knows how little progress has been made on this difficult issue during the past 10 years. I would hope that the Turkish Government realizes that there are many in Congress who want to resolve this complex issue. Pleas from certain Members of Congress to Ankara on this issue apparently fell on deaf ears. Continued intransigence on the part of Ankara will not help these congressional efforts to find an equitable solution to the problem.

A few months ago, the government of Rauf Denktash reaffirmed its readiness to negotiate on the reunification of the island and offered to turn the city of Varosha and Nicosia International Airport over to U.N. supervision. He also suggested that the Commission on Missing Persons be reactivated. A few days later, the Turkish Government offered to withdraw some of its troops from Cyprus.

I understand that a few troops have been withdrawn and that Commission meetings may begin this spring. Nothing definite has resulted from the other offers, however. Those offers to compromise were apparently made to win the favor of the United States. Let us see what kind of followup action occurs. Quite honestly, after so many years of waiting on this issue, the little progress that has been made is minimal, and I am disappointed.

I believe that the Turkish Government must clearly be told that what happens on the island of Cyprus does matter to the United States and to NATO. Ankara must clearly realize that security assistance to that country can be directly linked to progress on the resolution of the Cyprus issue. Continued delay on the part of Ankara will further harm the NATO alliance and worsen relations between Turkey and the United States. Although I am trying to be fair in dealing with this situation, the Turkish Government and Mr. Denktash must realize the urgency of giving this issue their full attention. It surely has our attention as time quickly runs out.●

GROUP USES MISLEADING INFORMATION IN BID TO RAISE FUNDS

HON. STEWART B. McKINNEY

OF CONNECTICUT

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mr. McKINNEY. Mr. Speaker, recently constituents in my district have been solicited in the mail by a group calling itself the National Committee to Preserve Social Security and Medicare. This group, nominally headed by James Roosevelt, is asking people to sign a petition to save the social security system.

Now there is absolutely nothing wrong with this or any group circulating a petition for a particular cause. Indeed, the first amendment of the Constitution states that, "Congress shall make no law * * * abridging the freedom * * * to petition the Government for a redress of grievances." I yield to no one in my respect for and defense of our Constitution.

However, Mr. Speaker, the National Committee to Preserve Social Security and Medicare has a checkered history. Last year, this same group invited people to contribute $10 to receive a "free personal confidential computer printout" of social security records. The group's letter went on to state: "This service is available only to those joining the National Committee." What the National Committee failed to indicate is that this information is available free to people who send in their name, signature, and social security number to the Social Security Administration.

Another recent solicitation from this same group, which again asks for a $10 annual contribution, contains errors and misleading information. For example, the 1983 amendments to the Social Security Act, which were based on recommendations by the Bipartisan National Commission on Social Security Reform, were overwhelmingly passed in the Congress. Yet the solicitation calls the reforms, "Ronald Reagan's recently enacted 'Social Security bailout'."

The mailing states, "The Medicare Fund has borrowed $12.4 billion from the Social Security fund." The opposite is true. The Old-Age and Survivors Trust Fund has borrowed $12.4 billion from the Medicare Hospital Insurance Trust Fund.

The National Commission describes proposed changes in social security to increase the minimum age for receiving social security, to tax a portion of social security payments as income. These proposals were enacted in 1983 as a part of Public Law 98-21. They are already law.

The group goes on to describe the danger of Congress eliminating minimum social security benefits and reducing benefits for early retirees. The letter neglects to say that both ideas were soundly rejected during congressional consideration of the 1983 amendments.

Even the latest, "corrected" version of the letter repeats the mistake that medicare has borrowed money from the old-age and disability funds.

Social security is our Nation's basic method of providing a continuing income when family earnings are reduced or stop because of retirement, disability, or death. Nine out of ten workers in the United States are earning protection under social security. About one out of every six persons in the country receives monthly social security checks and more than 24 million people 65 and older—nearly all of this Nation's older population—have health insurance under medicare. Another 3 million disabled people under 65 also have medicare. Nearly every family, then, has a stake in social security.

As we all know, the social security system is vital to this country. Twice in the last 7 years Congress has amended the Social Security Act to provide for its continued operation. The 1983 amendments were based on the recommendation of a bipartisan national commission and were passed because Members of Congress of differing political philosophies were willing to compromise to save the social security system from immediate bankruptcy. According to the best available actuarial estimates, the 1983 social security amendments insure that the cash benefits programs will be fully financed into the next century.

While I am and will continue to be alert to the health of the system, groups such as the National Committee to Preserve Social Security and Medicare, by promoting misleading information, make the job of saving the system and reassuring the many beneficiaries of the system of its continued stability much more difficult. Scare tactics aimed at older Americans are not proper means of communication. Social security is too important to the lives of so many Americans to be sensationalized by false and misleading information.●

FINAL REPORT OF THE COMMISSION ESTABLISHED FOR THE PURPOSE OF MAKING AN INVESTIGATION AND STUDY OF THE CONCERNS OF VIETNAM VETERANS

HON. JOE MOAKLEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, on December 30, 1983, the Special Commission on the Concerns of Vietnam Veterans submitted its final report to the General Court of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

The chairman, Senator Francis D. Doris, the vice-chairman, Representative Thomas J. Vallely, and the executive director, Mr. Paul R. Camacho, certainly are to be commended for the energy and thoroughness with which they and their colleagues on the commission handled their responsibilities.

Many of the issues raised in their report are of significant importance to the Federal effort with respect to the concerns of Vietnam veterans. Since the report sets forth substantial and important findings and recommendations for the enactment of Federal law, I have submitted the report to the Speaker, pursuant to clause 4 of rule XXII, for appropriate reference to committee.

Mr. Speaker, although the very comprehensive final report of the commission is too substantial to be printed in the RECORD, the work of the commission is of importance to each Member, so I take this opportunity to share with my colleagues the introductory materials which very well outline the scope of the commission's work. The general introduction by Commission Chairman Francis D. Doris is an eloquent statement of the importance of the mission with which the commission was charged:

To: All Members of the Massachusetts General Court.

From: Massachusetts Special Commission On The Concerns Of The Vietnam Veteran.

In submitting our Final Report of the Special Commission On The Concerns of the Vietnam Veteran, I wish to, on behalf of all the Commission Members, express our sincere appreciation to all the Members of the General Court for their unqualified support of the Commission through funding, appropriations and legislation enacted into law.

A special debt of gratitude is extended to William M. Bulger, President of the Senate; Thomas W. McGee, Speaker of the House; Chester G. Atkins, Chairman, Senate Ways and Means and Michael C. Creedon, Chairman, House Ways and Means. Without their complete support the mandate of the Commission would not have been met.

At this time I would like to laud the efforts of all Vietnam Veterans of Massachusetts whose leadership resulted in the establishment of this Commission. It was their strong advocacy for themselves, their fellow veterans and their dependents that resulted in the establishment of the Commission. Without them, the accomplishments of the Commission would not have become a reality.

Our Executive Director, Paul Camacho, deserves the gratitude of everyone concerned. In my opinion, there has been no stronger advocate for the Vietnam Veterans in Massachusetts or in the United States than he. His loyalty, devotion, dedication and leadership should be an example for all. A special thanks to his wife Chris and to their children. Without their sacrifice in allowing their husband and father to dedicate so much of his time, above and beyond, that which was required of him in order to fulfill the goals of this Commission.

Our Executive Secretary, Carmen Colon, worked diligently under very adverse conditions with little or no assistance. To her we extend our heartfelt thanks and say "thank you for a job well done."

It is most appropriate, on behalf of the Commission, that we extend our sincere thanks to Master Sergeant Jon R. Cavaiani United States Army, Special Forces, Vietnam Veteran, Ex-Prisoner of War and a recipient of the Congressional Medal of Honor, for his outstanding service and encouragement in thought, word and deed. And to his wife, Captain Martha Cavaiani, for allowing him to work with us during the past two years. We are deeply grateful, and "we thank you Jon".

We shall always remember the lives that we touched. We fondly reflect in this Final Report on the question of MIA-POW. We acknowledge the great bond of friendship and love that we established with Gordon and Inger Hardy and our work with them on this very sensitive issue. We walked, talked and paraded together throughout Massachusetts to bring to the forefront of our people the need for a resolution to the MIA-POW question. Many said it was a dead issue, however, we, as a Commission, did not and do not believe that to be the case. No greater evidence of this can be in the fact that Captain Arthur Hans Hardy's remains were returned to Massachusetts and were buried on a high and windy hill on a rainy day in Ipswich, Massachusetts in November of 1983. Until that time Captain Hardy was unaccounted for the last eleven (11) years. Our fight must continue.

Finally, to all the Vietnam Veterans of Massachusetts who have labored so long and so hard, we extend to you our sincere gratitude—the accomplishments of this Commission are your accomplishments. The leadership that you have demonstrated during the past two years in advocating for your fellow veterans and their dependents, have developed you into the leaders of tomorrow as it relates to all Veterans of all Wars.

I feel confident, as the work of this Commission comes to a close, that the issue areas that remain will continue to be worked on to a successful conclusion.

To everyone who has worked in any way to assist this Commission, we say Thank You. God Bless America!

Respectfully,

FRANCIS D. DORIS,
Chairman.

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to share with my colleagues the astute comments of the executive director of the commission, Mr. Paul R. Camacho. Mr. Camacho worked tirelessly on this vast project and his comments serve as a forceful statement for placing this work and the findings and recommendations in their appropriate context:

COMMENTS OF THE EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR

I would like to thank the Chairman, Senator Francis D. Doris, for allowing me the opportunity to express some of my thoughts concerning this entire project. With his permission, I care to take some leeway to speak both specifically and generally, both subjectively and objectively as a Vietnam veteran and as a social scientist.

Those who are acquainted with me know I have been doing research on the Vietnam Decade and its aftermath in terms of consequences for the veterans for over the last twelve years. They also understand the conditions in milieu in which I was hired. That is, this Commission had a number of options or routes it could have traveled. When I was graciously extended an interview, I informed them that the issue area approach was in my mind the most important. Though less noticeable in the immediate sense, it would pave the way for the development of long range strategies and tactics necessary to achieve tangible gains for the Vietnam veteran community at large, and especially for that portion of the community most in need. Evidently, the majority of the Commission members were also of that mind for subsequently I was hired.

Given the task, priorities had to be established and in this I with the sanction of the Chairman, Senator Doris, opted for the practical and pragmatic. In short we (this Commission) expended resources where we could have effect and in areas where we could achieve consequence favorable to Vietnam veterans. Given the resources available and the life span accorded the Commission, I think the accomplishments were substantial. We developed and catalogued a large body of data on issue areas, both staple and particular with proposals for resolutions. Here I refer to all the data, i.e., eight public hearings, five special hearings, approximately three to four hundred pieces of incoming and outgoing correspondence, the more than three hundred letters pertaining to the POW/MIA campaign, miscellaneous items such as the most pertinent letters and documents on the Federal Jobs Training Partnership Act, advocacy for the Vet Centers, the Vietnam Veterans Leadership Program, and individuals, as well as the statistical survey summary, the Interim and this Final Report. I firmly believe that the body of data in its entirety will stand the Vietnam veterans in this Commonwealth good for at least the next six years, provides information for the development of strategies and tactics necessary to achieve the compendium of goals as outlined in this Final Report.

Yet, as a social scientist, I am of the position that beyond this, these documents collectively provide an important points of insight into interesting historical events, an insight which will be invaluable to historians and social scientists of the future. That is, as a social and political phenomenon, the experience of the Vietnam decade and the impact its aftermath had for the Homecomers, the Vietnam veterans who accepted the horror of the responsibility, stands as unique in Modern American history.

The turmoil of the 1960's with its challenge to authority, followed by revelations of deceit and corruption, and culminating with the downfall of a Presidency and withdrawal from Vietnam is the social landscape against which the Vietnam veterans stand in profile or relief.

The number and impact of the situational and orientational themes here is almost incalculable. For example, there is the question of the "good people" and the "dirty workers". With the repeal of the Tonkin Gulf resolution, an entire country absolved itself of guilt and placed it squarely in the lap of the soldiers, now veterans. The bitterness of accusations and rebuffs were so severe that an entire generation of soldiers were on the verge of almost believing that responsibility for the entire affair was theirs and theirs alone. To look into the well is dangerous; yet it should be done, for all of this is of great symbolic and tangible importance for the future. America's war veterans have played a significant role in domestic politics, and have not been unaccounted for in connection with foreign policy. It comes to this as well, that certainly in the past the veterans of this nation have earned the mantel of ligitimacy to control the definition of patriotism in American life.

Now, the question at hand is this—given the fact that the history of the Vietnam decade is now a matter of debate among academics and key administrative officials of the past and present vis-a-vis the new Vietnam Scholarship, what role will Vietnam veterans play. They have become a matter of intellectual capital, utilized by both conservatives and liberals to legitimize their position—and yet have no input into the development of either position per se; they have become pawns utilized by and for the purpose of others. As a researcher, I have looked at this from different vantage points and there is no doubt in my mind that the vectors come together around this—the lessons of Vietnam, the meaning of patriotism as an orientation directing national action of the future, and inexorably connected to these two—the positions and relations the Vietnam veterans have in connection with all of this. And who has, or claims more of a right to a voice in all of this than Vietnam veterans?

During the week preceding Veterans' Day in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, veterans from three conflicts were buried. Vietnam/Laos, Lebanon, and Grenada. The answer to the question posed above is obvious. It is my personal belief that Vietnam veterans are at the proverbial crossroads, they can slip into obscurity, make some gains of various impact along one or two directions, or move forward to take their rightful place as leaders in the community, state, and nation, and achieve in coalition with others—a community of vision in America—for the future.

It will require hard work, but to reiterate a point noted by many, Vietnam veterans represent potentially one of the largest bulge votes in the Commonwealth and in the nation. And noting this then, I care to return to the immediate. These documents in their entirety provide for everyone a picture of the situation as it existed in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts in 1982–1983.

It is with all of this in mind that as a social scientist and as the Executive Director, I strongly recommend that: Data of this commission in its entirety of over 3,000 pages of documents be published in one volume to be available for all those interested.

Sincerely,

PAUL R. CAMACHO.●

SKY HIGH DEFENSE

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring the following article by William Randolph Hearst, Jr., Hearst Newspaper's editor in chief, to the attention of my colleagues. America needs to strengthen its defenses against the Russian nuclear force. Building a "high frontier" type of antimissile system makes a great deal of sense.

(By William Randolph Hearst, Jr.)

NEW YORK.—Our megabuck military budget, which President Reagan steadfastly pursued to build allied and American defenses against Soviet aggression, astoundingly provides little or no actual defense. It's not that we skimp on arms and nuclear arsenals but that the Soviet Union locked us into a posture where we will retaliate if they strike first at us and our allies. The method is known as "Mutual Assured Destruction," or MAD in conversational terms.

This is indeed mad, in anybody's language. A military man who is trying to set our thinking straight and assure the globe long-lived tranquility is retired Lt. Gen. Daniel Orrin Graham. Over the weekend, he launched a national campaign from Washington to acquaint Americans with his program called "High Frontier." Boiled down, it would intercept any first strike from the U.S.S.R. against us or our partners with space shots destroying incoming nuclear missiles.

A genial and intense man, Graham and I met over lunch before my recent trip to Europe. On a small screen, he showed me how incoming Soviet nukes could be handled and disposed of in space harmlessly. The retired three-star general could have, of course, gone fishing after more than 30 years of dedicated U.S. Army service, including a stint as director of the Defense Intelligence Agency. Not for him, though. He thought about his grandchildren and kids here and throughout the world. That acronym "MAD" got him started with scientists on a search that led to the High Frontier concept. It was so remarkable that President Reagan embodied the views in a nationwide televised address exactly a year ago.

The president's talk to fellow Americans was derided by critics as a combination of "Star Wars" and Buck Rogers derring-do. Their instant tendency was to belittle long ignored scientific research and the plainly inescapable conclusion of peaceful survival without mutual destruction. I would like to remind you in part of what the president told us:

"Let me share with you a vision of the future which offers hope. It is that we embark on a program to counter the Soviet missile threat with measures that are defensive. . .what if free people could live secure in the knowledge that their security did not rest upon the treat of instant U.S. retaliation to deter a Soviet attack; that we could intercept and destroy strategic ballistic missiles before they reached our own soil or that of our allies.

"Would it not be better to save lives that avenge them?" inquired President Reagan tellingly.

That's the beauty of Gen. Graham's concept as presented to people-at-large, confounded by freezeniks and propaganized internationally by the Soviets who don't want us to get going.

When President Eisenhower—also renowned as General Eisenhower, Supreme Allied Commander in World War II and later of SHAPE—made an agreement 30 years ago with the Soviets to abandon the space anti-ballistic project, the U.S.S.R. welched. We kept our word but the Soviets clandestinely keep working on an idea originally wholly American. Obviously the Soviets count on being first so they can blackmail the West.

Gen. Graham's project began with his ideas, scientific help—and little money, none from the government. Reinvigorated, the starting stages would cost us $2 billion which is peanuts. It would go up to $15–20 billion in four years, still small change when you think of what's at stake for mankind.

The initial phase for High Frontier, according to Gen. Graham, would be non-nuclear, as additional protection of our ICBM silos. We will use conventional projectiles to blast arriving missiles out of the sky. Phase 2, in the Graham program, proposes a Spaceborne Missile Defense System (SBDM). This will have around 400 orbiting satellites. In turn, each of them would carry 40–50 non-nuclear infrared homing so-called "kill" weapons. These are guaranteed to destroy 80 percent of attacking missiles by firing thousands of small projectiles at a speed of about 20,000 miles an hour. Any aggressor would then believe that a first strike is a real gamble.

Finally, there's Phase 3 of the Spaceborne SBDM. When developed it will have intercepts via sensor improvements or the addition of laser-particle beam weapons. Mind you, all these ideas of Gen. Graham conveyed to President Reagan are strictly for defense. Mutual destruction is hardly defensible since hundreds of millions will be killed in the holocaust. Otherwise as the 60-year old general says: "We have no defense whatever against any long-range missile attack."

From all I can determine, the U.S.S.R. has gone ahead with research and development of its own in a project similar to Gen. Graham's. Due to its stringent secrecy, the Soviets don't share any of their findings or failures with anyone. They long have wilfully ignored agreements and treaties to abandon clandestine nuclear projects.

What they have promoted and boasted about is the number of nuclear weapons the Soviets have pointed directly at the U.S., since 1979. It's nearly double the number they once promised for the SALT-II treaty, back in 1979. I got this information from senior officials of our intelligence agencies.

In five years, the Kremlin increased the total of their warheads aimed at us from about 5,000 to 9,400. The Soviets also upped the number of their launchers to nearly 2,500 although an early agreement called for a maximum of 2,225. We have around 6,000 warheads pointed at the Soviet Union and will decrease missile launchers from 1,850 to 1,800 next year.

Never mind our efforts to have any comparable arrangements with the U.S.S.R. Let's get behind the High Frontier recommendation of Gen. Graham which was espoused by President Reagan. In the near future, I'll be telling you more about this anti-ballistic missile defense and what it means for all of us in the free world.●

SECRETARY PIERCE HONORED BY SPECIAL AWARD IN MEMORY OF DR. MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR.

HON. BILL GREEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, on January 13, 1984, Coretta Scott King, the widow of the late civil rights leader, Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., presented to Housing and Urban Development Secretary Samuel R. Pierce, Jr., the Martin Luther King, Jr. Special Award. This high honor, sponsored by the Martin Luther King, Jr. Center for Nonviolent Social Change in Atlanta, was for Secretary Pierce's outstanding contributions to the enhancement of social justice and social responsibility and to improving working relationships among government, labor, and management.

In presenting the award to the Secretary, Mrs. King said that:

Secretary Pierce * * * has one of the most important, yet difficult jobs of any Department head in Washington. HUD is concerned with the housing and development needs of our cities, with the implementation of our national policy to provide safe, decent and affordable housing for all our people, especially those who lack the financial means to compete for housing in the conventional market * * * [A]t a time when our economy was in serious difficulty, * * * Secretary Pierce managed to meet the challenge, to withstand the pressure and to keep faith with our national housing policy through the continuation of essential HUD programs which advanced equal housing and minority enterprise objectives.

The inscription on the plaque presented to the Secretary read as follows:

In recognition of his leadership in maintaining Housing and Community Development Programs in our Nation's cities and for assuring that fair housing and minority business enterprise goals were an integral part of the administration of those programs.

Sam Pierce's personal association with Dr. King goes back to 1963 when the Secretary argued a case for Dr. King. In accepting the award Secretary Pierce said he was fortunate to have known Dr. King and that he enjoyed "a personal association with a man I admired. He was an inspiration to me and still is. I believe in his principles and everything that he stood for. He was a great man."

In an address following the presentation of the award Secretary Pierce emphasized the theme of partnership between government and business especially in creating housing for the poor and stimulating economic development. The Secretary cited Urban Development Action Grants (UDAG's) as being effective in helping communities attract or leverage private investment. Secretary Pierce declared that although the Federal Government must help address the basic needs of people, "local initiative is essential," adding:

I believe we [the Federal Government] serve well by providing technical assistance, and by delivering seed funding for local projects and efforts that won't succeed without our help.

As a long-time friend and coworker with Sam Pierce in a variety of endeavors, I know this high honor is richly deserved. Secretary Pierce's exemplary record of public service is a matter of special pride to all of us from his home city—New York City—and to all who share his commitment to the goals of excellence in governmental performance.

It is fitting and proper that the names of Samuel R. Pierce, Jr., and Martin Luther King, Jr., be linked through this special award.

I believe every Member of this body can be proud that such a distinguished individual is a member of the President's Cabinet. We join the King Center in saluting Secretary Pierce's leadership and commitment in furthering the goals of equal justice and civil rights in America.●

THE GRACE COMMISSION

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington report for Wednesday, April 4, 1984, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

Everyone agrees that federal spending must be cut, and that fraud, waste, and abuse in federal programs must be eliminated. The problem is getting the President and a majority of Congress to agree what spending should be cut and how fraud, waste, and abuse should be eliminated. For 18 months the Grace Commission has wrestled with the problem. Its work is now over. According to the commission, its 2,478 suggestions would save up to $424 billion over three years by rooting out inefficiency in federal programs. Supporters say that the commission's work shows us how to cut the deficit painlessly, while critics find it biased.

Many criticisms of the commission's work have surfaced in the weeks since the release of its report. First, the report's sheer magnitude means that most ot the proposals will not be studied in depth. Second, many of the proposals have been around for some time. Third, almost two thirds of the proposed savings would require legislation, much of which would be controversial. Fourth, many of the proposals focus not on administrative efficiencies but rather on direct cutbacks in social spending. Fifth, questions have arisen about conflicts of interest, like those which may arise when executives of chemical companies sit on the panel that hopes to ease rules for the disposal of toxic wastes. Finally, the non-partisan General Accounting Office (GAO) and Congressional Budget Office (CBO) say that only one third of the estimated savings can be documented, that some proposals have already been implemented, that others are too vague to quantify, that still others would raise costs, and that many more may not render savings for years.

Despite these worries, it is clear that the work of the commission is too important to ignore. The corporate executives comprising the commission are capable people, and they provide a critical business perspective on the federal government's operations. Even if $400 billion in savings cannot be realized, many of the cost-cutting ideas have merit and have given new impetus to the campaign to streamline federal programs. Several themes emerge from the commission's report:

The commission is critical of efforts by members of Congress to keep military bases and other projects in their states, even if shifting them elsewhere or eliminating them entirely makes more sense from a management, and national, point of view. Thus, it recommends that a presidential panel be set up to study military base closings. The potential three-year savings is $3 billion.

The commission believes that the information processing systems in various federal agencies are unduly costly because they are outdated and uncoordinated. It estimates that significant savings in hardware-related costs could be realized by increasing eightfold the rate at which older computers are replaced by newer ones.

The commission suggests expanded use of social security numbers and income tax returns, as well as better computer systems, to check people's eligibility for federal benefits. It notes, for example, that the Veterans Administration alone could save $1.5 billion over three years if it detected only two times the errors it detects now.

There is no reason why it should cost the Army $4.20 to process a payroll check when the private sector does it for $1.00. Among the various changes in cash management the commission calls for are faster deposit of federal receipts, faster collection of customs duties, numerous accounting revisions, and more use of electronic funds transfer. The CBO says that this last change could save more than $1 billion next year.

The commission favors a tougher effort to collect overdue federal loans, claiming that some agencies make only three attempts versus two to three dozen in the private sector. It argues for deduction of late payments from the tax returns of delinquent borrowers, a practice which might bring in $2.4 billion over the next five years. Also favored is a new push by an expanded Internal Revenue Service (IRS) to collect back taxes.

Grave problems in the defense industry can result in the Pentagon paying $3,400 per hour for work on a new missile—100 times what the work is worth. Recognizing the need for solutions, the commission describes ways to improve defense procurement, including more use of common parts and standards, a two-year budget cycle for the armed services, mandatory purchases of weapons from more than one supplier, and maintenance of defense production at economic rates.

The commission asks for better management of inventory by the Pentagon. It stresses the need for improved computer systems, complete inventory taking, and better techniques of replenishment to cut future defense purchases. The commission thinks that adequate inventory taking alone could save $7 billion in three years.

The commission believes that the federal government can raise the productivity of its employees by upgrading their skills, changing outmoded methods of operation, and investing more in work-saving equipment. The commission suggests that a permanent productivity-oriented bureau in the Office of Management and Budget (OMB) may be the key to making federal workers more efficient. Higher productivity could trim thousands of jobs from the federal work force by attrition.

The commission wants to impose user fees on those who benefit from certain federal services. It would expand or increase fees when federal water is used to generate electricity or when timber is harvested and cattle are grazed on federal land. According to the CBO, user fees charged by a single federal agency, the Coast Guard, would yield $3.7 billion over five years.

Many of the Grace Commission's ideas will be accepted, but we should bear in mind that the federal deficit would not be erased even if every one were put into effect today. Recent fiscal policies have created too radical an imbalance between federal income and outlays. Nonetheless, the commission has made serious proposals which deserve Congress's and the President's attention.●

THE PRESIDENT'S FISCAL YEAR 1985 BUDGET

HON. THOMAS J. DOWNEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mr. DOWNEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, as we begin to consider the Federal budget for fiscal year 1985, we should pause for a moment and consider the President's budget, which for some mysterious reason many of my friends on the other side of the aisle are reluctant to talk much about.

I would like to highlight a few of its effects on programs for poor people and its effects on the State of New York. The Community Service Society of New York has prepared an excellent analysis of the President's budget. I would like to commend the Community Service Society, and its president, Mr. James R. Dumpson, for their work. I recommend the analysis to my colleagues.

According to CSS, of the $9.2 billion in domestic spending cuts contained in the President's budget, $3.7 billion, or about 40 percent, will come from programs which are intended to assist poor people in this country. The President's budget brings back once again several major policy changes which Congress has rejected in the past, and which, no doubt, we will reject this year.

The President seeks to end the community service block grant, the work incentive program, and—should we be surprised—the Legal Services Corporation. This would mean a loss of $950 million in current services. The President assures us that these services can be covered by other programs such as the social services block grant, the Job Training Partnership Act and the AFDC program. But this claim is just a little disingenuous because these programs are also targeted for significant cuts and changes in service.

Under the President's budget, according to CSS, New York State would lose $20 million in employment and support service revenue. Changes in the Job Training Partnership Act would mean a loss of $12.4 million in title II-A funding for New York City alone; this is the employment training program for youths and adults. In addition, the State would lose $14 million in funds for the economic development administration, funds which will help put people back to work.

The medicaid proposals are particularly dangerous. By proposing to continue the 3-percent penalty, the President's budget would cost New York State $79 million, of which New York City would account for $28 million and Suffolk County $4.74 million. I hasten to add that we have resolutely laid that particular proposal to a much deserved rest. Other medicaid changes would mean an additional loss of $24 million for the State.

Proposed changes in the medicare program would mean a loss of $100 million for New York State. Food stamp program changes would cost $68 million.

All these numbers conceal the immense human cost involved in the President's budget. Is it any wonder that no one in the administration is anxious to have a vote of the President's budget?●

MARGARET CHASE SMITH FEDERAL BUILDING

HON. OLYMPIA J. SNOWE

OF MAINE

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Speaker, I stand today to introduce legislation that will portion due honor to a great Maine stateswoman, former Senator Margaret Chase Smith, by naming the Federal building in Bangor, Maine, for her.

Margaret Chase Smith represented Maine's Second District for 8 years in the House of Representatives, and served Maine 24 years in the U.S. Senate. From her very first congressional session in the summer of 1940, through over three decades of service, Senator Smith exhibited a blend of elegance, wisdom, strength, and courage that was unique among legislators. Unique has become a common description these days, but it describes Senator Smith perfectly.

On September 13, 1948, the people of Maine voted Margaret Chase Smith into the U.S. Senate by a 71.31 percent majority. She became the first woman elected to both Houses of Congress, whose tenure has exceeded that of any other woman.

In 1944, she became the first woman ever to ride an American destroyer in wartime—a fitting distinction because it would be hard to find a stronger ally for a strong American defense than Senator Smith.

In 1949, Associated Press named her "Woman of the Year." And in 1964, she became the first woman to be placed in nomination for President at the national convention of a major political party. She came away with the second highest number of votes in the final ballot of the Republican National Convention.

What Margaret Chase Smith has done to build confidence in women of three generations is, in itself, worthy of recognition. You may recall that when Margaret Chase Smith was elected to the House in 1940, women had only been voting for 20 years. But Senator Smith would be the first to admit that she never acted according to what was best for one sex, or even one State, or one party. She weighed her decisions upon the scale of what was best for all Americans.

It took courage and an independent spirit to go against the party grain, as she did when she voted against the nuclear test ban treaty. But there was in that instance, as in all instances where she seemed to be the renegade Republican, a sound logic to her rollcall. She voted as she did because she saw in the test ban treaty ways of getting around it, of having one nation test a nuclear weapon and not be detected. A nuclear loophole like that, she rightly reasoned, could put the United States at a disadvantage.

Perhaps her greatest virtue as a politician was her willingness to take a firm stand on issues where she felt strongly. A primary example was when the country was gripped by McCarthyism. It was a nation-eroding disillusion that was being spread by a few politicians who were themselves taken in by the scare. Senator Smith saw that the only way to counteract the damage being done to the fabric of the country was to begin telegraphing an equally forceful and reasonable legislative voice disclaiming the scare.

At a time when political tempers were red hot, Margart Chase Smith and six of her colleagues joined in a declaration of conscience. The beauty of the declaration is that it returned to the American people the mantle of trust, and broke the finger of distrust that was being pointed at them by the Federal Government.

It is my opinion that the qualities of courage, dedication to not one but many causes, and service to this country—its land and its people—are laudable qualities. Furthermore, I believe upholding the public trust and trusting the public should be the principal obligations of every politician. Senator Smith possessed these qualities and fulfilled these obligations; and she nurtured them in a long list of citizens, statesmen, and stateswomen. It is appropriate that the House now pass legislation upholding these virtues, by naming the Federal building in Bangor, Maine, in honor of Margaret Chase Smith.●

HONORING THE EDUCATIONAL AND CULTURAL FUND OF THE ELECTRICAL INDUSTRY

OF NEW YORK

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call to the attention of the Congress of the United States the work of the educational and cultural fund of the electrical industry on the occasion of the 36th Annual Scholarship Award breakfast which is to be held on Saturday morning, April 7.

The scholarship program was initiated in 1949 with the awarding of the first A. Lincoln Bush, William A. Hogan, and the Father William J. Kelley, O.M.I., Memorial Scholarships. Since the inception of this program, additional scholarships have been awarded annually to assure young men and women of ability and promise the chance to gain an education that will provide them with the background necessary to meet society's challenges of tomorrow. Mr. Chairman, this scholarship program has enabled students to accumulate over 740 academic degrees.

In 1984 the educational and cultural fund will be awarding the 36th Annual Father William J. Kelley, O.M.I. Memorial Scholarship. This scholarship was created in 1949 and has been awarded annually to young people interested in pursuing a 4-year degree program leading to the bachelor of science at Cornell University in the New York State School of Industrial and Labor Relations. This award is open to the sons and daughters of the employees of the electrical industry. In addition, the fund will award the 16th Annual Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. Memorial Award. This scholarship was established in 1969 as a memorial to a great American. The award helps to provide higher educational opportunities to deserving black students and the scholarship may be used for study at a college of the recipient's choice. Both of these scholarships consist of $2,000 for an academic year and will be renewed annually for a total of $8,000. The educational and cultural fund is also awarding the 18th Annual Dean Harry J. Carman Fellowship which is awarded in recognition of outstanding scholarship to graduate students. Candidates must have completed all the requirements of the Ph. D. except for the dissertation. In sum, there will be 30 scholarships awarded at the breakfast with a total cash value of $240,000.

Mr. Speaker, it is important to take note that since its creation the educational and cultural fund has made outstanding contributions to education, the electrical industry, the city, State, and Nation—not only does it create the appropriate atmosphere to learn for college students, but also the organization considers the educational and cultural needs of the very young and the not so young. The officers of Local Union 3 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and the trustees of the educational and cultural fund of the electrical industry in 1972, recognizing this need for young children, organized Camp Integrity and has served over 6,500 boys and girls. In addition, the educational and cultural fund provides educational programs for members of Local 3, including guest lectures by noteworthy labor and political leaders.

Mr. Speaker, the educational and cultural fund of the electrical industry helps its community and membership maintain a vibrant and healthy environment, and sets an example for other organizations to emulate. I ask that the Members of the Congress of the United States join me in congratulating the educational and cultural fund of the electrical industry; Hon. Armand D'Angelo, chairman; Charles Scharfe, Jr. and Thomas Van Arsdale, vice chairmen; Morton D. Hoffman, treasurer; Edward J. Cleary, secretary; Donald F. Menagh, counsel; Hon. Robert F. Wagner, public member; Joseph D'Angelo, chairman of the joint industry board of the electrical industry; Thomas Arroyo, Jr., Lola E. Barton, Melvin Cole, Samuel Collins, Leon Conn, Frank Conti, John E. Dooley, Henry Gottlieb, Hy Greenblatt, D. Bert Haring, Hon. Jacob Javits, Joseph B. Maguire, Charles Salzhauer, George Schuck, Jr., Louis Stein, Edward H. Sullivan, Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., James M. Watters, Jr., and Walter D. Whitelaw, trustees; Anthony Ruocco, Jr., director; scholarship winners and the entire membership of Local 3 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers on the 36th Annual Scholarship Award breakfast.●

HONORING EDMUND S. MUSKIE

HON. JOHN R. McKERNAN, JR.

OF MAINE

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mr. McKERNAN. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to honor the distinguished former U.S. Senator from Maine, Edmund S. Muskie, by naming the Federal building in Augusta, Maine, after this great American statesman.

Ed Muskie's career in politics has been an inspiration to those of us dedicated to public service. Muskie began his career as the minority leader in the Maine State Legislature, and later served as Maine's Governor for two terms. In 1958, he won a seat in the U.S. Senate, where he served with distinction for over two decades. In the crowning glory of his political career, Muskie was named Secretary of State by President Carter in 1980.

As Governor of Maine, Ed Muskie focused on the environmental and economic issues that were to be the hallmark of his political career. He was one of the first to emphasize the need for tough environmental laws, and he became deeply involved in legislation to foster economic development and growth, not only in Maine, but all across the Nation.

As a U.S. Senator, Muskie played a significant role in formulating the Nation's economic development policy, in reforming Government operations, early model cities and housing legislation, and security industry reform legislation. Again, Muskie's greatest achievement came in the area of environmental policy; the remnants of his work are still with us today—embodied in our farsighted clean air and clean water policies.

Muskie made his mark in the foreign policy area while serving on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. In this assignment, he acquired the knowledge that enabled him to assume the role of Secretary of State during a period of international strife, and he served ably until the end of the Carter administration.

Today, at age 70, Edmund Muskie retains the respect of his friends and former colleagues because he served this Nation admirably, because he demonstrated good judgment when entrusted with enormous responsibility, and because he was, and still is, a man of integrity.

Mr. Speaker, it is with a deep sense of respect that I introduce this legislation to name a Federal building in Augusta, capital of our great State of Maine, in honor of Senator Muskie.●

SHORTAGES PLAGUE SALVADOR'S ARMY

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, during the debate on continued military assistance to El Salvador, a number of questions have been raised about the urgency of the need for more military aid. A recent commentary by Fred Reed in the Washington Times describes in vivid detail the shortages that are affecting the Salvadoran Army. I urge my colleagues to heed Mr. Reed's warning, a restatement of the Kissinger Commission conclusion: "The United States is doing just enough to get these people in deep trouble, but not enough to get them out."

The article follows:

(By Fred Reed)

SAN FRANCISCO GOTERA, EL SALVADOR.—For three days I have been a guest of the Morazan Battalion, headquartered in this low, poor, pastel, and dirty city. With me are an American doctor and another American, an authority on military small arms. We have been depressed by the Salvadoran army. Regarding which:

1. It is badly equipped. Its rifles and machine guns—M16s, G-3s, and M60s—are worn out, used up. The soldiers say they have never even seen cleaning gear. There are no spare parts, as for example bolts and barrels, and no armorers to repair broken weapons. We found troops using arctic-grade gun-oil, which was all they had. El Salvador is not in the Arctic. Infantry weapons are easy to maintain, up to a point. Then you need knowledge and tools. For example, an untrained solider cannot strip the bolt of a .50 caliber machine gun. The troops here tried, reassembled it incorrectly, and destroyed it when they fired it. Even an armorer needs all sorts of esoterica such as go-no-go gauges, barrel wrenches, stones, and expertise. If you don't have them, guns slowly become useless.

2. Their medical situation is criminal. They have almost no trained medics. The "medics" they have have to go into combat with a few field dressings, some penicillin, and maybe a bottle of glucose solution. The latter, my doctor friend growls, is almost useless as a blood replacement. A Salvadoran told us they had saline solution, but for some reason didn't use it. There are no medevac helicopters. The army has only 20 choppers, only some of which will work at a given time. They are used primarily for moving troops and cargo, and for medical purposes only when otherwise idle. This means that badly wounded men can wait six or eight hours before reaching care.

They can't be treated in the field because no one knows how to do it. Often the wounded come out in trucks—bleeding, unsplinted, and alone, because there are no medics to ride with them. The level of medical ignorance is very high, and so is the death rate. A friend of mine tells of flying behind the lead chopper on a medevac run and noticing oil leaking along the side of the lead bird. It wasn't oil. A wounded man had a severed femoral artery and the door-gunner didn't know how to tie him off. He died. So goes this little war.

3. They need radios. We saw a few, but not nearly enough. A counter-guerrilla war involves patrols by small units, and close cooperation with mobile troops, as for example heliborne reaction forces. This is wild country. Without radios—lots of them—any soldiers you can't see might as well not exist. When a radio breaks, they can't fix it, and they can't quickly get anyone else to do it. It's a lonely feeling to be guarding a bridge or road out in that hot overgrown hill country, 20 feet from bushes you can't see through, with no way to call for help.

4. I saw no sign that people hereabouts are afraid of the army. Some of the police here have an evil reputation, very evil, but the army is a different entity. In regions I visited, the populace showed no sign of alarm or even particular interest when the army appeared.

5. Training is lousy, although I am told by friends who should know that it is improving. More on this next week.

6. To editorialize a bit, it looks as though the United States is doing just enough to get these people in deep trouble, but not enough to get them out. I'm afraid we will give them enough to keep them afloat while the war gets nice and vicious and big. Then we will pull the plug, as in Cambodia, and a bloodbath will follow.

Maybe we should not play half-seriously at war. Half-seriously at wars abroad entails responsibilities.●

DO NOT CRY FOR ME—NEW YORK BANKS

HON. DENNY SMITH

OF OREGON

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mr. DENNY SMITH. Mr. Speaker, recent developments in the financial markets have brought back memories of coming before this body less than a year ago debating the merits of an increase in the U.S. quota for the International Monetary Fund. At that time, if I recall correctly, there were any number of controversial amendments addressed which would make the foreign lending practices of the large U.S. banks adhere to the same standards that they would apply to borrowers in the American economy. We also attempted to make conditions for these Third World Nations receiving loans from the IMF much tougher. I think many in the U.S. Congress felt that by supporting an increase in the U.S. quota for the IMF, we would be heading off a financial crisis that would ring loud and clear throughout the entire international financial community. According to the banks, this crisis could have proven disastrous for a number of large eastern banks. Yet, here we are again with our Federal Government teaming up with those same U.S. banks and four Latin America countries with a rescue package to respond to Argentina's debt crisis. I think it ironic that the countries promoting this package are the very Latin countries whose own loans to those U.S. banks are also nonaccrual.

Who ever said there is "no free lunch" never came to the public trough where the New York banks feed. It is certainly not Merrill Lynch's money that bailed out these banks for their bad debts. The final slap in the face to taxpayers came when Secretary Regan said the money used to cover the bad debts is not taxpayes' dollars. How can that be when the important ingredient of the rescue package is an agreement by the United States to lend $300 million to replace the $300 million from Mexico, Venezuela, Brazil, and Columbia, once Argentina signs a new agreement with the IMF.

Argentina has repeatedly failed to abide by the conditions and austerity measures set forth by the IMF, and serious doubts exist as to the country's future ability to make interest and principal payments. How long are we going to put off the day of reckoning?

The Federal Government continues to pour good money into a fund which is only chasing after bad money. We continue to approve increases in our quota for the IMF; in fact, we have approved increases in the U.S. quota seven times since its inception, the most recent in 1978, 1980, and 1983. My guess is that they will be back for another one in 1985. And yet we continue to take this form of action because we are constantly threatened by default of one or more less-developed countries where U.S. banks have so heavily invested. It has to be clear that the banks' profit motive takes into account no one but their own. I certainly do not see any sympathy by the banks for Main Street America.

If they want to see an impending financial crisis, they should come home to Oregon's main street and watch my local autodealer close shop because he can no longer afford to floor cars, or watch as my farmers see their hopes and dreams fade while the banks foreclose on their farm loans. In the West, high interest rates have forced my lumbermill workers out of the woods. And yet, it is my taxpayers whose homes, cars, and businesses are on the brink of, or already have been, foreclosed that the Government calls upon them to cover the New York bankers' bad judgment. The bad loan decisions are the problems of the banks' management and stockholders—not the U.S. taxpayers. The taxpayers should not be expected to absorb the banks' losses and guarantee them a profit. I urge you to cosponsor and help me to block this latest raid on the Treasury which is paid for with the taxes of working Americans.

The following is an article on this subject which appeared in the Wall Street Journal that will provide background on what is occurring with regard to the rescue package for Argentina.

[From the Wall Street Journal, Apr. 2, 1984]

BRIEF REPRIEVE: ARGENTINE PACT AVOIDS TROUBLE NOW, BUT LATIN DEBTOR NATIONS MAY FACE POLITICAL PRESSURE

At first blush, the last-minute financial rescue package for Argentina seems to turn the internaional debt crisis on its head. Four heavily indebted Latin nations helped pull Argentina and hundreds of U.S. banks back from the brink.

It was a novel package that offers something for everybody. Argentina—in hock for $43 billion—appeases the banks with very little of its own money. Bankers get other Latin countries and the U.S. Government pitching in to help save the banks' first-quarter earnings. And the U.S. Government can count on other Latin debtors to pressure Argentina to sign a tough agreement with the International Monetary Fund.

But experts see a lot of clouds inside the silver lining.

For Argentina, Friday's rescue package could increase its political isolation within Latin America if the country doesn't come to terms with the IMF. For the Latin countries, it may create some domestic political pressure from opponents accusing the governments of siding with the bankers against a neighbor. And for the banks, it may impose the heaviest burden: the agreement sets the stage for a debtors' cartel, which may not repudiate debts but might try to dictate lenient debt-repayment terms all over Latin America and elsewhere.

INGENIOUS PLAN

Whatever the ultimate costs, nearly everyone considers the plan ingenious. Mexico and Venezuela each have lent Argentina $100 million, with Brazil and Colombia kicking in another $50 million apiece. Eleven banks—five American and six foreign—agreed to lend a total of $100 million, at unusually low interest rates. Each bank contributed in proportion to its existing exposure in Argentina; Manufacturers Hanover Trust Co., with $1.32 billion outstanding, and Citibank, with an estimated $1.1 billion, had the largest shares.

Meanwhile, the U.S. agreed to lend $300 million once Argentina signs a new agreement with the IMF; that loan will repay the four loans from the Latin nations. The U.S. is to be repaid when Argentina receives its IMF money. Argentine officials promise an IMF pact within 30 days. Such an agreement would provide the country with new funds in exchange for imposition of an economic-austerity program, which typically includes reductions in budget deficits, tighter control of the money supply, and currency devaluations.

The rescue package announced Friday came as a welcome ending to what had seemed a hopeless situation. For months, Argentina had been balking at paying interest on its debt, and the banks had been balking at lending new money unless Argentina signed an IMF agreement.

BACK INTEREST

But with the $400 million in new loans, plus another $100 million from Argentina's foreign-exchange reserves, Argentina cleared up at least some of the back interest owed to the banks. If U.S. bankers hadn't received that money by last Saturday, the end of the first quarter, they would have had to classify many of their Argentine loans as nonaccrual; banks generally put loans in the nonaccrual category when interest payments are 90 days overdue. When a bank classifies a loan as nonaccrual, it doesn't record as income the interest due, and it subtracts from current profit any previous interest that was recorded but not collected.

U.S. Treasury Secretary Donald T. Regan said the accord was designed to help Argentina and avoid an international banking crisis. It wasn't, he said, a bank bailout. "Our problem was how to help Argentina, not the banks," Mr. Regan commented at a press conference Saturday.

The plan was the brainchild of Mexico's treasury secretary, Jesus Silva Herzog, was engineered by the U.S. Treasury and Federal Reserve and was massaged by hordes of bankers and investment bankers. The Mexicans devised the plan—and the Brazilians, Venezuelans and Colombians went along—partly because all of them fear a damaging fallout from an Argentine-bank blowup; Mexico itself, for example, owes more than $85 billion to all foreign creditors, and Brazil's foreign debt exceeds $90 billion. These countries need continuing help from the banks to cope with this debt.

PROTECTING PROGRESS

"We have a lot of incentive to convince the other nations to be cautious," says one official in the Mexican finance ministry. "We have suffered a lot to get to where we are, and we don't want to see them upset it."

Already, one banking source says, Mexicans were partly blaming Argentina for a delay in putting together a $3.8 billion loan from banks this year. Some banks have been holding out because they lump all Latin American countries together. Although they "know Mexico is different from Argentina, [both] speak Spanish," one banker says.

Bankers were heartened by the Mexican initiative. For the past couple of years, bankers have derided suggestions that debtors would form a cartel that might present a tough negotiating posture to the banks; the debtors' interests were too different, bankers have said. Some bankers read the Argentine bailout as vindication of their ideas—even though the debtors joined forces, they said, it was to help a country pay the banks, not to repudiate debts. Some bankers also argued that the last-minute rescue reinforces the belief that countries won't default on their debts.

Francis X. Stankard, the executive vice president of the international sector of Chase Manhattan Bank, said, "This is unquestionably the most constructive development to date in the international-debt situation. It represents an extraordinary cooperative effort among the nations of Latin America, the U.S. Government and the private banks."

That may be true, but sources in Latin America suggest that the bankers may be whistling in the dark.

For one thing, the $500 million covers only Argentine public-sector interest that fell due before Jan. 1. So, although U.S. banks avoid having to declare those loans as nonaccrual. Argentina still owes a total of about $2 billion in back interest to all creditors. The deal buys the banks a little time, but they may face the same problem at the end of the second quarter.

"It couldn't be a permanent kind of arrangement," says Celso Luiz Martone, an economist at the University of Sao Paulo in Brazil. "It can only be accepted as a (temporary) help to avoid bigger trouble."

But more important, these Latin sources say, are the governments' other motives for their joint efforts with regard to Argentina. They say that although the debtors now are joining forces to help the banks, the next time they may join forces to hurt the banks.

In Colombia last week, Mexico's president, Miguel de la Madrid, may have given a signal of the new attitude. He called the current economic problems stemming from the debts "unprecedented" and "dangerous," and he assailed the developed nations for their high interest rates and trade barriers. He also advocated a new approach to the debt crisis and a united front by Latin American debtors in negotiating with international bankers.

Most likely, sources said, such a cartel wouldn't refuse to pay foreign debts, but rather it would seek more lenient repayment terms for debtors. For example, the debtors may ask for a reopening of all the agreements that they have reached with banks since mid-1982 on debt stretchouts and new loans. Bankers balked at an earlier Mexican request for such a reopening.

One banker estimates that the countries may demand to reopen loan agreements covering as much as $50 billion. A lot of interest money would be at stake. A reduction in interest rates of just one percentage point would cost international banks $500 million a year in gross income.

Another lender speculates that Mexico and other Latin countries will allow Argentina to lead the way for a reopening of loan agreements. Argentina, he says, is being used as a "point man, the one to carry the spear."

POLITICAL COSTS

Significantly, Argentina received unusually lenient terms on the $100 million bank loan Friday. Argentina will pay only one-eighth of a percentage point above the London Interbank Offered Rate (Libor), which banks pay one another for funds in the London money market. The Latin countries will receive one percentage point above Libor. Because Argentina hasn't borrowed recently, it is hard to compare these terms with any recent Argentine credit, but the going rate for Latin countries has been 1¼ to more than two percentage points above Libor. Argentina's new terms "are now the benchmark" for future bank loans and stretchouts, an investment banker says, although longer-term credits may well command a higher margin.

The joint bailout also carries some potential political costs for Argentina and for the four other Latin countries. For Argentina, it is no longer a "matter of posturing" with the international bank creditors and the IMF, one Argentine financial source says, "but a very serious dangerous political commitment." The new civilian government, he says, "will be under extraordinary pressure" to reach a stringent accord with the IMF.

Argentina is said to have balked at IMF demands that it forestall an increase in its workers' real wages—wages adjusted for the country's towering inflation rate. As a result, the bargaining won't be easy. If Argentina dosen't agree with the IMF, then it risks a break with its neighbors. That's the peer pressure that banks and the U.S. government are counting on to ensure that Argentina does sign.

Though Mexico, Brazil, Venezuela and Colombia clearly believe that the benefits outweigh the risks, their involvement also could stir up some domestic political heat. The populations of at least Brazil and Mexico have suffered wrenching austerity measures, and now their governments are in the position of appearing to side against Argentina and with the IMF and the banks. That stance could provide fodder for the political opposition in those countries.

"We have to be very careful how we present this domestically," one Mexican Government official says. "The banks can think this is Mexico, the banks and the IMF against the Argentines, but we want to present it more as an example of Latin unity. That should reduce some of the rhetoric about us becoming tools of the banks."

BANKS DIVIDED

Finally, the rescue plan could exacerbate the growing split between the big U.S. banks and their regional and European brethren. Because of more favorable tax treatment on writeoffs, a more flexible regulatory environment and higher profit margins, European banks generally don't feel as much pressure as do U.S. banks to receive interest payments promptly. German and Swiss banks, in particular, don't have to report constant earnings increases to protect their stock prices.

Similarly, the Argentine exposure of most regional U.S. banks is small enough that they can afford to write off bad Argentine loans with minimal pain. Once this is done, there is little incentive to participate in new bailout proposals.

So, Friday's bailout could lead European and regional bankers to accuse the big U.S. banks of maintaining the illusion that the Argentine loans are still collectable. They also say the big banks were so eager to avoid putting loans in nonaccrual that the banks gave away the store in the negotiations.

It shows, they say, that a country is rewarded for playing hardball, not straightening out its economy and not adhering to an IMF program.

FERES DOCTRINE TRAGEDIES

HON. JAMES F. McNULTY, JR.

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mr. McNULTY. Mr. Speaker, approximately 1 year ago I introduced a bill to permit men and women of our armed services who have been injured on account of medical malpractice to be permitted to a day in court. Under the prevailing interpretation of the Federal Tort Claims Act of 1946, the so-called Feres Doctrine, such suits are now barred. This is the case no matter how poor the medical care extended and no matter how grievous the harm resulting.

Since the introduction of H.R. 1942, 57 Members have indicated they will serve as cosponsors. This is very encouraging to me and I know to many of the families of victims of past tragedies who are numerous.

Notices of further afflictions continue to come to my attention. William J. Cavanaugh, a retired Army colonel has written me of the case of Seaman John Beals, a name I now in regret list as among those who have been frustrated by the Feres Doctrine. A brief description of the Seaman Beals situation has appeared in the Middlesex (Mass.) News. Congressman BARNEY FRANK, who represents Middlesex in this House, has labored industriously to advance H.R. 1942 in the legislative process and worked to assist the Beals family in their ordeal.

I am hopeful our colleagues in the House will carefully examine the case for H.R. 1942 and add their names as cosponsors.

The article follows:

[From the Middlesex News, Mar. 6, 1984]

ILL SAILOR'S STORY WELL TOLD

EDITOR, THE NEWS: The Middlesex News is to be congratulated for its sensitive handling of the Seaman John Beals story ("Navy won't pay sailor's cancer bills" Feb. 24, "Navy Relents, will pay for seaman's care" Feb. 25 and an editorial "Navy torpedoes itself" Feb. 25).

Your reporters were sensitive to and respected the right of privacy of a family undergoing an emotional ordeal, yet they told the story of insensitivity by the U.S. Navy and I am sure contributed to justice for the serviceman and his family. I hope that the pressure of the free press will continue to exert itself until the questions of Seaman Beals' long-term treatment costs and disability compensation are resolved as he faces an uncertain future.

The Seaman Beals case is just the tip of the iceberg of indifference and injustice to many servicemen and women who suffer medical problems incident to service to our country. Cases of medical neglect, incompetence and, indeed, malpractice are well documented by organizations such as the Citizens Against Military Injustice (CAMI) and are acknowledged by the Department of Defense.

Why do they persist? Essentially because the military medical care delivery systems are protected from legal redress by the so-called "Feres Doctrine."

Feres was a Supreme Court ruling in the early 1950s which excluded active duty military personnel from the rights extended to all other citizens under the Federal Torts Claims Act of 1946. Even a prisoner in a federal penitentiary can seek legal redress in the event of medical malpractice.

The need to protect a military commander from legal suit resulting from combat-related incidences is of course obvious in order to preserve military discipline. However, the extension of sovereign immunity to all aspects of military life, especially during peacetime, is a travesty of justice and, in the case of military medical care, may actually promote and tolerate incompetence.

A bill has been introduced in Congress (H.R. 1942, Congressman McNulty of Arizona) to correct this basic injustice and to grant service members and their families the same rights the rest of us citizens enjoy at least in the area of medical malpractice.

A tribute that Middlesex News readers can pay to Seaman Beals, and countless other area servicemen and women who offer their lives and well being on our behalf, would be to write their Congressman and Senators urging support for the so-called McNulty Bill (H.R. 1942) and a similar bill now being framed in the U.S. Senate by Senator Pell of Rhode Island.

FEDERAL FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE FOR SMALL BUSINESS

HON. AUGUSTUS F. HAWKINS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mr. HAWKINS. Mr. Speaker, as Mr. Reagan blazes the campaign trail with promises of economic recovery, the small business community is struggling to keep pace with its corporate cousins. The plight of small business is an awesome one, since the expectations fostered under its jurisdiction include providing employment for the majority of Americans, expanding technology through innovation, and promoting the existence of the "American dream." With all of these objectives, not to mention the strengthening power of being the "backbone of the economy," small business should be ranked as one of the top concerns of any administration.

Although Mr. Reagan has directed the Small Business Administration (SBA) to "initiate and sponsor conferences across the country," to improve the state of small business, the most popular question put to the administration is, "Where's the beef?" Where is the direct financial support small businesses need to accelerate their productivity.

With small business providing over 70 percent of the Nation's employment, the incentive to advocate the function of Small Business should be high on the administration's list. The conferences have a positive appeal by offering new concepts and ideas to promote all small business owners, especially veterans, women, and minorities.

What is not being offered, however, is an increase in SBA's budget, which would provide more opportunity to small business owners to expand their establishments, increase their employment rolls, and provide services for their communities. It is time that the "supporters of the Nation" get the Nation's support.

With the exception of a request for an increase in guaranteed loans, SBA has made no major budget revisions for fiscal year 1985, thus allowing very little support for the number of new small businesses entering the market. In some respects, budget requests were limited or slightly decreased, causing an even wider margin between small businesses and their accessibility to financial assistance through Government funding. If the present trend continues, the chances of most small businesses, especially minority small businesses, surviving their first year is highly remote. And without these small businesses, the foundation of the economy is weakened, thereby fostering national financial instability.

With all of this at stake, America cannot affort to ignore small businesses' call for support. it is time for the administration, as well as the rest of America, to look beyond the positive benefits that small business provides, in terms of increased employment, higher productivity, stronger local economics, and decreasing rates of inflation through increased competition. Moreover, it is time for the Reagan administration to maintain the principles that promote the continued progress of small businesses in America by providing adequate funding for small business concerns.●

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing a bill today to extend for an additional 5 years section 120 of the Internal Revenue Code to allow group legal services to remain a tax-exempt fringe benefit.

Since Congress first opened the door for group legal services in 1973 by an amendment to the Taft-Hartley Act, working men and women across America have had free or low cost, yet high quality, legal services they might otherwise have not been able to afford. Through the bargaining power of group plans, employers have been able to hire lawyers and set up special law offices solely for their employees, at a modest cost to the company. In other cases, companies have contracted with highly competent attorneys in private practice to aid their employees when legal help is needed.

Mr. Speaker, the record shows that employees who have this fringe benefit have made great use of it, from drawing up wills and sealing real estate transactions to fighting for their rights in a court of law. And because their company provided this benefit, many sought legal help when they otherwise may have found attorney's fees and court costs prohibitive. Employees under the plan have sought legal advice earlier, avoiding litigation that would have been inevitable if they had waited and would have further tied up our already overloaded judicial system. Group legal services have made affordable to members a basic freedom of American democracy—a means to defend the rights they are guaranteed in the U.S. Constitution.

My bill will allow employers to continue offering group legal services to their employees by keeping this fringe benefit tax exempt. Without this status, companies could not afford to set up such plans and many, many American workers would again find legal services far too costly. With the provision in place, employers pay only a modest cost per employee and workers could continue to reap the benefits of low cost, quality legal services.

Mr. Speaker, group legal services have been a great advantage for all parties involved. We cannot allow this provision, which will expire in 1985, to lapse. I believe this is a reasonable and wise measure that all my distinguished colleagues can support. I urge prompt consideration and approval.●

HAZARDOUS WASTE DISPOSAL SITES LEGISLATION

HON. JOHN BRYANT

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mr. BRYANT. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, March 27, 1984, I introduced legislation to require sellers of property containing currently licensed hazardous waste disposal sites to explicitly notify the buyers. Buyers should be fully cognizant of precisely what they are buying. No one should be forced to buy a pig in a poke. This legislation is strictly a notification provision, not requiring an oppressive amount of paperwork or any expenditure of money.

My bill would require the owner or operator to provide the following information to the buyer of the property.

First, the type of and amount of waste which has been treated, stored, or disposed of on the particular parcel of land;

Second, the dates during which these activities occurred;

Third, any closure, removal, or remedial action which has been taken to restore this site; and

Fourth, the type and amount of waste listed or identified which remains on the site as of the date of transfer.

Records of these disclosures are to be maintained by each subsequent transferee and by the Environmental Protection Agency. What we are essentially creating here is a paper trail which will allow the Federal Government to follow and prospective purchasers to know what happened on these sites.

According to Chairman FLORIO, of the Commerce, Transportation, and Tourism Subcommittee of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, it is "virtually impossible to build a land disposal facility that can contain waste for as long as that waste threatens public health. Not surprisingly one of the major causes of contaminated ground water is our continued reliance on land disposal in landfills, or in pits, ponds, and lagoons." This type of disposal and the lack of appropriate notification has brought about such situations as the one at Love Canal.

Hearings before the Commerce, Transportation, and Tourism Subcommittee have confirmed that hazardous waste threatens the health of millions of Americans. Each year, we generate about 250 million tons of hazardous waste, over 2,000 pounds for every man, woman, and child in America. This is an increase of 30,000 percent since the end of World War II. If even one-quarter of this amount of waste is buried, it can create problems for which we may pay dearly in years to come. Leaks could endanger the lives of our families and children. Ground water may be contaminated. The soil may be contaminated beyond repair. Citizens may be forced to abandon homes for which they have worked long and hard.

My bill would not entirely eliminate this problem, but it is a step in the right direction. Incidents like Love Canal undermine the faith of the American public in the Federal Government's ability to protect its citizens from injury from hazardous waste.

While this legislation does not address the problem of abandoned disposal sites or sites not licensed by the Federal Government, it will help preclude the problems encountered in situations, like that at Love Canal. As I am aware that real estate regulations are generally governed by the several States, I have contacted the National Association of Attorneys General and the National Association of Realtors for their input.

I am concerned about the problem of hazardous waste and the deleterious effect that it has on our citizens. I feel certain that my colleagues will agree and support swift passage of this bill.●

INTRODUCTION OF A BILL ENTITLED THE HONEY RESEARCH, PROMOTION, AND CONSUMER INFORMATION ACT

HON. E de la GARZA

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation that would enable the producers and handlers of honey and honey products to finance a nationally coordinated research, promotion, and consumer information program designed to expand their markets for honey and honey products.

Mr. Speaker, honey is produced by many individual producers in every State in the United States and in the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico.

The maintenance and expansion of existing honey markets and the development of new markets or uses are vital to the welfare of honey producers and those concerned with marketing, using, and processing honey. Unfortunately for this important agricultural industry, however, consumer demand for honey and honey products is not as great as it should be. Despite a steady rise in production capability, the U.S. honey industry continues to fall short of its marketplace potential.

It has been difficult to develop and implement a coordinated program of research, promotion, and consumer education because the honey production industry is comprised mainly of small- and medium-sized businesses.

Without cooperative action in providing for and financing such programs, honey producers, handlers, wholesalers, and retailers are unable to implement badly needed programs of research, promotion, and consumer education.

This legislation would give the honey industry the necessary tools and impetus to launch a national program for: first, research in developing new uses of honey and honey products; second, increasing consumer awareness of the nutritional quality and versatility of honey; third, preparing and distributing educational and recipe materials to home economists, schools, and food editors; and fourth, seeking and testing new and potential markets. All of this would be financed by honey producers and importers at no cost to the Federal Government.

Other agricultural commodity groups have solved similar problems by forming research, promotion, and consumer education programs. The egg, wheat, wool, cotton, and potato industry campaigns have met with much success. These programs bear out the old mercantile proverb: "It pays to advertise!" Producers have found they must extoll the virtues of their products, educate the consumer to create a greater demand, and thus expand their market outlets.

It is interesting to note that the potato industry, for example, through its industrywide merchandising program, has increased potato consumption in the United States while helping to educate consumers. Its export promotion programs have opened up new foreign markets for U.S. potatoes and have contributed positively to our Nation's balance of trade. The honey industry, through this legislation, could follow a similar pattern of activity.

Nothing in this act would dictate quality standards for honey, provide for control of its production, or otherwise limit the right of the individual honey producer to produce or market honey.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, this bill would authorize the establishment of an orderly procedure for the development and financing, through an assessment to be paid by producers and importers, of a coordinated program of research, promotion, and consumer education designed to strengthen the position of the honey industry in the marketplace and maintain, develop, and expand markets for honey and honey products. Any participant, so desiring, may request a refund of any assessment fees. After the program is initiated, there will be no cost to the American taxpayer.

I urge my colleagues to join me in sponsoring this bill.●

SAN MATEO COUNTY DENTAL SOCIETY'S "BRUSHMOBILE" SHOWS THE WAY TO PROPER DENTAL CARE

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of my colleagues in the House to an exciting dental health project currently taking place in my district under the leadership of the San Mateo County Dental Society. Under the leadership of Dr. James Ridgeway, the society has revitalized its "Brushmobile" service to improve the standard of dental care in San Mateo County.

The Brushmobile concept originated in the early 1970's with the purchase and renovation of a 1962 schoolbus. The vehicle became a mobile classroom, complete with running water, sinks, and, for its time, a unique audiovisual system. "Prevention through proper dental health care" is its message, and over 20,000 first- second- and third-grade San Mateo County children each year, from both private and public schools, benefited from it. A driver-educator takes the bus to the various schools and presents the program to the children. She is assisted at times by students in the dental assistants program of the College of San Mateo, dentists' wives, dental assistants, and volunteers from the local PTA.

Since the old bus has been running on borrowed time, a new one has been purchased by the Dental Society and it will be put in operation later this year. The new "Brushmobile" will include some of the most up-to-date preventive dental care programs. The majority of the funding for this project comes from the efforts of the San Mateo Dental Society, and the service is free of charge to participating schools.

I am delighted with the tremendous success of the "Brushmobile"—it is a concept which has now been copied throughout the country. I look forward to the dedication of the new brushmobile later this year, and extend my warmest congratulations go to the San Mateo County Dental Society.●

JOHN R. LEE: A HERO'S AWARD

HON. GEORGE M. O'BRIEN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, John R. Lee of Frankfort, Ill., was awarded a medal recently by the Carnegie Hero Fund Commission for rescuing Thelma S. Davis from her burning home on September 26, 1982. I would like to take a moment to recount his extraordinary act of bravery.

Mrs. Davis, 63, lay unconscious in a burning bathroom of her two-story home. Lee, 33, a neighbor, was alerted; he went to the second floor of the Davis house and after getting a flashlight, crawled 30 feet through thick smoke and intense heat to the bathroom. He found Mrs. Davis but could not remove her. Worsening fire conditions and smoke forced him out of the house. Undaunted, Lee entered the house a second time and crawled to Mrs. Davis. This time, he was able to remove her from the house.

Mr. Speaker, though Mrs. Davis required extensive hospitalization for her burns, she is alive and well today because of John Lee's efforts on her behalf. As John Lee's Congressman, I am proud that he has received the Carnegie commission's award—an award which is well deserved.●

LINDA CLARK

HON. STAN LUNDINE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mr. LUNDINE. Mr. Speaker, last month, Linda Clark offered the Social Security Administration ultimate proof of her disability. She died.

Less than a month before her death, the Social Security Administration refused to hear her appeal, claiming that her health was so improved since she was first disabled in 1979 that she could now return to work.

Her autopsy report says that is just not so.

Linda Clark suffered from juvenile diabetes since she was 3 years old—a crippling disease inhibiting a child's development and usually claiming its victims before they celebrate their 20th birthdays. When Linda Clark died at the age of 34, she suffered a massive heart attack brought on by circulatory problems and kidney failure. Her coronary arteries were so severely hardened and diseased that all four chambers of her heart were dilated. She suffered from severe, chronic bronchitis that often left her too breathless to talk. She was legally blind.

Linda Clark is a victim of another disease, an administrative nightmare created by Congress and perpetuated by the Reagan administration. The harsh measures taken by the Social Security Administration to comply with the law we passed will continue unabated unless we act. Despite our passage last week of the Social Security Disability Benefits Reforms Act, a companion measure faces an uncertain future in the Senate and the Reagan administration opposes both efforts.

Because Congress has never set forth the standard of proof for termination, the Social Security Administration will continue to halt benefits and refuse their reinstatement until men and women in ill-health prove—at their own expense—that they are just too sick to work.

Poor people cannot afford that. Uneducated people cannot combat that. Mentally ill people cannot help themselves. People suffering from cancer, kidney disease and heart ailments have no strength to help themselves.

By remaining silent, Congress is perpetuating this injustice. Thousands of disabled men and women seek relief from this travesty of fair play in Federal courts of appeals, where the burden of proof is finally placed where it belongs—not on the weary shoulders of disabled men and women but squarely on the shoulders of the bureaucracy paring the disability rolls—the Social Security Administration. Our courts practice reason and compassion, a justice to which our policies are blind and our ill-gotten gains not the cost-saving bonanzas we expected but only tragic miscalculations with price tags too high to pay.

Until disabled men and women reach that final shelter of Federal courts, they endure months or years of unspeakable hardships, deprived of benefits that buy their food and their medicine, that pay their doctors' bills, that clothe their children, and patch their leaky roofs.

When the Social Security Administration revoked Linda Clark's benefits, they neither resolved the Federal debt nor pared an expense breaking the backs of American taxpayers. Linda Clark only received $409 each month. Medication and therapy for her juvenile diabetes and its many complications often cost more than $1,000 each month.

During their 15 years of marriage, Linda Clark lost three children while she valiantly tried to give her husband the child they had always wanted. Last November, her husband lost his job in a massive cutback at the community's largest employer. Without his weekly paycheck and her monthly disability benefits, the couple seldom had two dimes to rub together.

Linda Clark was not one to take charity. Macaroni replaced meat on the table. Their small, old house grew cold when she slashed the heating bills. When Linda Clark could not pay her doctor, she canceled her visits. When Linda Clark could not pool enough pennies to buy her medicine, she rationed her pills.

Just before her death, the Social Security Administration told Linda Clark that she owed them more than $2,000. They gave Linda Clark 30 days to repay all the benefits she had received during her long months of appeal. But Linda Clark did not have 30 days to live.

Her husband filed an appeal posthumously asking that the debt be waived because of hardship. Subsisting on unemployment benefits, her husband faces more than $3,500 in funeral expenses and more than $8,000 in medical costs from the last days of Linda Clark's life. He cannot even afford to buy a headstone for his wife's grave.

We owe Linda Clark much more than the cost of a headstone.

We owe Linda Clark a law that will consider multiple impairments and the crippling effect their combination can have.

We owe Linda Clark a law that places the burden of proof upon the Federal Government, that requires the Social Security Administration to show medical improvement before benefits are terminated.

We owe Linda Clark a law that eliminates a reconsideration process that is costly, untimely, and inconclusive.

We owe Linda Clark a law that puts disabled men and women face-to-face with the medical technicians who now decide claims in offices more than 300 miles away after quick glances at hastily scribbled notes from physicians whose first and only glimpse of patients may have lasted less than 10 minutes of a grueling day.

The legislation we passed last week can help pay our debt to Linda Clark. The legislation could curb the inhumanity of the review process and curtail wasteful spending that the careless policies now encourage.

No one can put a price tag on Linda Clark's life. Her death is a tragic consequence of our insensitivity. It may also be an invaluable contribution to the plight of disabled men and women across America, for in death Linda Clark has shamed us all.●

HON. HENRY A. WAXMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, last week I was unavoidably absent for the House vote on H.R. 3755, the Disability Benefit Reform Act of 1984. Had I been present I would have joined the majority of my colleagues who voted overwhelmingly to pass the bill.

The need for immediate reform in the disability review program cannot be overstated. This administration's attempts to reduce the disability rolls have imposed terrible hardships on thousands of worthy beneficiaries. Hundreds of thousands of people have been denied benefits to which they are entitled. These are people who are severely disabled, who cannot work, who depend upon the social security disability system for their very existence, and who previously worked and earned their right to be protected from economic disaster in the event of severe disability.

When Congress passed the disability amendments in 1980, the intent was to carefully review the medical eligibility of those persons receiving disability benefits and to ferret out fraud. The result, however, has been nothing less than a wholesale purge of the disability rolls. The benefits of deserving recipients are being terminated because of flawed procedures, poor data and arbitrary decisionmaking. There is simply no excuse for this.

Steps must be taken to put more consistency, equity, and administrative control into the review process. If properly structured a review program can be implemented successfully without jeopardizing the rights of the disabled who legitimately depend on disability for their life support. H.R. 3755 offers this kind of framework. It provides important safeguards for individuals who are subject to review and issues specific guidelines to eliminate the choas which continues to plague the program. It deserves the undivided attention of the Senate.●

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, I was unable to be in attendance to vote on three amendments to the budget resolution that was under consideration. Had I been present, I would have voted against the amendment offered by my friend from Colorado, an amendment that embodied the President's budget proposal and served no use to the budget process; I would have voted against the amendment offered by my colleague from California, which I believe was a hypocritical effort to cut the budget since it lowered domestic spending by $136 billion, but gave $100 billion more to the Pentagon; and, I would have voted against the amendment offered by my colleague from Louisiana, since the amendment called for substantial reductions in domestic spending while it increased the defense budget by $64 billion.

Mr. Speaker, I am in strong opposition to any budget proposal that does not reorder our priorities away from dramatic increases in defense spending to a sensible approach that gives the Pentagon no more than they need and restores cuts to domestic spending.●

HON. WAYNE DOWDY

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mr. DOWDY of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I have received a copy of a letter from 31 members of the House Agriculture Committee to House Commerce Subcommittee Chairman FLORIO outlining their interest in H.R. 4813, the pending Superfund reauthorization legislation. I request that this letter be reprinted following my statement because I share the Agriculture Committee members' concerns about proposals contained in the Superfund legislation that will eliminate the tax exclusion for chemicals used in the production of farmer used fertilizers. I am alarmed that this particular provision of H.R. 4813 will unnecessarily increase agricultural production costs by approximately $142 million per year—a cost that my Mississippi farmers and other farmers in our country cannot afford.

I believe that it is very important that the House of Representatives proceed expeditiously with the reauthorization of Superfund, and I fully support this effort. However, I would like to point out that the 1980 debate on Superfund clearly identified the validity of a tax exclusion for farmer used fertilizers. The record in 1980 was clear that a fertilizer exemption was justified, and I believe that the record today is clear that the exemption is still justified.

I want to thank the members of the House Agriculture Committee—in particular my colleagues Congressman Bedell and Congressman Madigan—for bringing this problem to our attention. I agree with their concerns and plan to work with them to hold down farmer production costs. I would point out that we are not advocating exclusion from the tax for chemicals that end up in hazardous waste sites. Rather, we are supporting the maintenance of an exclusion from the Superfund taxes for chemicals used directly by farmers on their fields.

Finally, I would like to take this opportunity to encourage my colleagues in the House to aid those of us on the Energy and Commerce Committee in acting promptly in the reauthorization of the vital Superfund program.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., March 20, 1984.

Hon. JAMES J. FLORIO,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Commerce, Transportation, and Tourism, Committee on Energy and Commerce, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: We are writing as members of the Committee on Agriculture to express our concern about certain provisions contained in H.R. 4813, "The Comprehensive Hazardous Substances Cleanup and Emergency Relief Act of 1984."

We believe that the objectives of the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation and Liability Act of 1980 (CERCLA) are extremely important and we commend you for beginning the process of reauthorizing the Act.

However, in our review of H.R. 4813, we noted with great concern that, among other things, it eliminates the current CERCLA excise tax exemption for fertilizers and certain chemicals used in the production of fertilizers, despite the legislative history of CERCLA which clearly shows that the Congress intended this agricultural exemption to relieve hard-pressed American farmers from the burden imposed by the tax.

Moreover, during debate in the Senate on CERCLA, reference was made to the report accompanying CERCLA issued by the Senate Committee on the Environment and Public Works which noted that the fertilizer industry is not a significant contributor to the hazardous waste problem. In fact, although agricultural fertilizers are exempt from the excise taxes, those hazardous wastes resulting from the fertilizer production process are properly taxed under CERCLA today.

We strongly believe that the two primary considerations which gave rise to the original agricultural exemption—the threat of increased production costs for farmers and the fact that the fertilizer chemicals do not contribute significantly to the hazardous waste problem—are just as valid today. Farmers remain under severe financial pressure as a result of high production and borrowing costs, natural disasters, and slumping exports. It is estimated that the fertilizer taxes proposed in H.R. 4813 would add at least $142 million annually to farm production costs. And, unlike producers in other industries, farmers—as price takers—cannot pass on their increased costs. In addition, we maintain that the Congress was correct in recognizing in CERCLA that the excise taxes should be based on the degree to which a chemical contributes to the hazardous waste problem, and not on the fact that it is a chemical per se.

Finally, because of the cost/price squeeze facing many farmers today, a tax on fertilizer would almost certainly result in reduced fertilizer consumption, and thus adversely affect an already-depressed fertilizer industry. Fertilizer sales have plummeted by 25 percent within the past two years, resulting in bankruptcies, plant closings, and layoffs throughout the fertilizer industry.

We hope that you will recognize our strong support for the agricultural exemption as you proceed with further consideration of H.R. 4813, and we look forward to working with you in fashioning a bill acceptable to all.

Sincerely,

IMPROVED TAX TREATMENT FOR CHARITABLE USE OF A CAR

HON. CARROLL A. CAMPBELL, JR.

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing legislation today which would increase the mileage deduction for the charitable, volunteer use of a person's automobile from 9 cents to 12 cents per mile.

This legislation is one step in the direction of achieving total tax equity for persons who use their own automobiles in the course of carrying out charitable activities. The tax law currently allows persons who use their automobiles for business purposes to deduct 20½ cents per mile whereas the allowance for the charitable, volunteer use of an automobile is only 9 cents per mile.

I have cosponsored legislation which would end the discrimination against persons who use their cars for charitable purposes. H.R. 2697, for instance, provides that the charitable mileage allowance would be the same as the business mileage deduction. Although the 12-cent-per-mile allowance which I am introducing today may appear to be only a partial solution, it may have a greater likelihood of success this year. The Senate Finance Committee recently recognized the value of the charitable use of automobiles by approving an amendment to increase the charitable mileage allowance to 12 cents per mile. Thus, while my preference would be to enact a complete solution (such as H.R. 2697), and while I will continue to urge the adoption of total parity, I do not want us to come away from the conference committee with no increase in the mileage allowance. If the 12-cent mileage allowance is adopted, we should continue to work toward total comparability in the future.

Mr. Speaker, I commend the numerous public-spirited persons who volunteer their time, talent, and automobiles to charitable activities. The value of their contribution to society is significant. We should recognize and encourage their charitable activities by providing them with the same mileage deduction afforded to business. I want to commend my distinguished colleagues from the Ways and Means Committee, Mr. FRENZEL, Mr. THOMAS of California, Mr. MOORE, Mr. GRADISON, and Mr. SCHULZE, who have joined me as original cosponsors of this legislation. I urge my colleagues in the House to join us in supporting this proposal.●

GEORGE WILL'S SUPPORT OF LEGISLATION TO MOVE THE U.S. EMBASSY TO JERUSALEM

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, as one of the primary sponsors of H.R. 4877, legislation calling for the United States to move its Embassy in Israel from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem, I read with considerable interest George F. Will's recent article in Newsweek entitled "Power, Politics, and the Embassy."

I commend Mr. Will's analysis to the attention of my colleagues and believe his insights provide a valuable perspective from which to consider the debate on the Jerusalem Embassy issue.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, I insert the full text of Mr. Will's article at this point in the RECORD:

[From Newsweek, Apr. 9, 1984]

POWER, POLITICS, AND THE EMBASSY

(By George F. Will)

In the controversy about where the U.S. Embassy in Israel should be located, both sides have been asking for trouble in loud voices. Trouble is something fate has a way of furnishing with a lavish hand.

Since the founding of Israel, the U.S. Embassy has been in Tel Aviv. Israel says its capital is Jerusalem. Israel alone among nations is denied by other nations the right to stipulate its capital. Now Senator Pat Moynihan has 37 cosponsors for his bill to move the embassy and ambassador's residence to Jerusalem, and Representative Tom Lantos, Democrat of California, has 213 cosponsors for an identical bill. Secretary of State George Shultz opposes the bills on three grounds, only one of which seems strong.

Shultz says moving the embassy "would be taken" as a prejudgment of "one of the key issues"—the status of Jerusalem—"which must be freely negotiated between the parties" and might fatally damage U.S. credibility as "peacemaker." But there is only one other party with the slightest claim to Jerusalem. It is Jordan, which after 36 years of refusing all negotiations with Israel has forfeited its right to consideration. And King Hussein has recently expressed his disdain for the United States as peacemaker.

Shultz says moving the embassy would "fan Islamic extremism" and perhaps provoke mob violence against U.S. personnel and facilities. But U.S. policy is not a thermostat capable of controlling Islamic extremism, which will continue to rage against the United States no matter what U.S. policy is. And it is well to remember this: one reason there is a Reagan administration is that the previous administration was perceived as weak when dealing with mobs and an embassy in the Middle East.

POLICY

More importantly, Shultz says the Moynihan and Lantos bills improperly infringe on the president's "exclusive constitutional responsibilities to conduct diplomacy and to determine the country's recognition policy." But this is not a recognition question comparable to extending or denying diplomatic recognition to a nation. Congress would be compelling the president only to abandon a chimera and to conform policy to an incontrovertible fact. The chimera is the belief that the status of Jerusalem is negotiable. The fact is that Jerusalem is Israel's capital. Ask a random sample of Americans to name the capitals of, say, Delaware, Vermont, and Israel. Most will know Jerusalem than Dover or Montpelier.

The proposal to move the embassy is designed to nip in the bud a noxious growth. Israel's enemies have taken to stressing that even west Jerusalem is "occupied territory." Now, the correct (that is, my) position on the embassy is wine too strong for the likes of Hart and Mondale. It is: move the embassy to east Jerusalem, the part captured when Jordan attacked in 1967. That would express, emphatically, the fact that the 19-year division of Jerusalem was an accident of the 1948 armistic, and the unification of Jerusalem 17 years ago is irreversible. Perhaps in the late 1940's it was possible to believe that negotiations could produce concord about Jerusalem. Today it is not possible. No visible or anticipatable Arab government will countenance a united Jerusalem under Israeli sovereignty, and no conceivable Israeli government will consider anything less. When a subject is, on every side, nonnegotiable, it is imprudent to pretend otherwise.

The issue of moving the embassy suits Mondale's taste for a foreign policy long on moral poses and short on more tangible forms of power. And it fits his "cafeteria politics,"whereby groups are invited to Walter's Restaurant to fill their trays from a rich selection of dishes for every appetite. Hart could have used this issue to underscore his advertised reluctance to leap through hoops at the command of particular constituencies. Instead, he did an ungainly somersault through the hoop. He changed his position to support the move and blamed his earlier opposition on his staff, as usual. Reagan's threat to veto any bill mandating movement of the embassy is misguided policy, but is at least manly. (And it probably will cause Moynihan and Lantos to try to pass only a nonbinding resolution.)

NATIONAL PRIDE

It sometimes seems that the foreign policy of the Democratic left is that the United States should be only strong and assertive enough to defend Israel. Imagine the dismay and contempt among Israel's leaders as they watch Hart and Mondale scramble for Jewish votes. In New York both divided their time between promising to move the embassy and vying to see who could seem most horrified by any use of U.S. power. The safety of Israel depends not at all on moving the embassy 47 miles. It depends considerably on the credibility of U.S. power. Such credibility is a small part of the foreign-policy calculations of Hart and Mondale.

They are trying to evict an administration that prides itself on realism and the restoration of national pride. Yet the administration has unrealistic hopes for negotiations and an undignified eagerness to make preemptive concessions to Arab mobs. Reagan has a remarkable capacity to have a ceiling cave in on him without it leaving so much as a flake of plaster in his hair. The Lebanon debacle seems not to have damaged him. But that was another instance in which it was safety to be America's enemy than its friend. The Moynihan-Lantos effort is an opportunity for the United States to say: we know our friends, and with them we stand.

In August 1980, the United Nations demanded that the 13 nations with embassies in Jerusalem remove them. They did, but one, Costa Rica, has returned to Jerusalem. Some persons will say: Costa Rica can do that because it does not aspire to be an impartial mediator in the region. But impartiality is not a worthy aspiration for the United States where Israel is concerned. The most important reason for moving the embassy is not to serve Israel's security, but to serve the American spirit. The mere fact that nations are presuming to dictate where a U.S. Embassy can be is a sufficient reason adhering to Nelson's fire-poker principle. Admiral Nelson said: "It matters not at all in what way I lay this poker on the floor. But if Bonaparte shall say it must be placed in this direction, we must instantly insist upon its being laid in some other one." Call it standing tall.●

LEONARD GORDON: ONE OF SAN FRANCISCO'S OUTSTANDING CITIZENS

HON. SALA BURTON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mrs. BURTON of California. Mr. Speaker, San Francisco has many people active in social work—helping the young and the old, the poor and the disadvantaged. One of the finest is Leonard Gordon, now executive director of the Ella Hill Hutch Community Center.

Mr. Gordon has spent all of his adult life working to improve the lives and opportunities of young people in San Francisco. He will be honored for his work by the hundreds of people who know what he has done for the community. I am pleased to be able to take part in that tribute by bringing his work to the attention of my colleagues in the House of Representatives.

Leonard Gordon's career shows his lifelong dedication to helping young people: Executive director, Ella Hill Hutch Community Center, multiservice center in San Franciso's western addition; program director/acting director, Youth for Service, an agency providing educational and counseling service to disadvantaged youths and their families; senior group worker, Booker T. Washington Community Center; and recreation director, San Francisco Park and Recreation Department.

He has received a number of honors for his achievements, including: Certificate of appreciation, United Way of the bay area; certificate of dedicated service, Booker T. Washington Community Service Center board and staff; outstanding service award, South Park community; outstanding service award, San Franciso Residential Support Center; leadership to youth and dedicated service award, adult citizens of the Western Addition community; certificate of appreciation for services rendered, Portrero Hill/Dogpatch Youth Council; appreciation for leadership to youth, youths of the Western Addition community; and appreciation award for outstanding services, Hamilton Recreation Center.

Leonard Gordon is neither rich nor famous. He is, however, "rich" with the reward of knowing he has helped so many young people in San Franciso and "famous" among those youths and their families.●

LEGISLATIVE INTENT AS IT PERTAINS TO AN AMENDMENT TO THE PAYMENTS-IN-LIEU-OF-TAXES PROGRAM CONTAINED IN PUBLIC LAW 98-63

HON. RAY KOGOVSEK

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mr. KOGOVSEK. Mr. Speaker, on July 30, 1983, the President signed into law Public Law 98-63, the fiscal year 1983 supplemental appropriations. Chapter VII of the measure contains a provision that amends the Payments-in-Lieu-of-Taxes Act (PILT) and corrects a judicial misinterpretation of the original law. Originally enacted in 1976, PILT compensates local government for loss of tax base due to tax-exempt Federal natural resource lands. When Congress passed the PILT Act, it intended that such payments be used to compensate those units of local government which are the principle providers of service to the public lands. In the overwhelming majority of cases, counties provide these services to tax-exempt lands located within the jurisdiction of their—counties'—political boundaries.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit, on December 20, 1982, rendered a decision on Meade Township, et al. against Cecil D. Andrus, et al., affecting the distribution of funds available under the Payments-in-Lieu-of-Taxes Act. The appellate findings reversed a district court decision and remanded the case for proceedings consistent with the following opinion:

. . . we hold that the Secretary exceeded his authority under the Act when he included a "primary provider of services" standard in his definition of "units of general government." The appropriate relief in this court consists of striking the regulation and directing the Secretary to conform his administrative policy to the plan language of the Act. . . .

I, along with several of my colleagues, introduced H.R. 2071 to overturn the court of appeals' decision and clarify Congress intent as to how PILT payments should be made. Through committee hearings, it became quite clear that Congress intended these payments to be made to counties as the principal provider of services. Subsequently, the Senate entertained a motion to include this language as a provision of what is now Public Law 98-63. During the Senate floor debate an additional amendment was added which allows a State to enact legislation to assume the distribution of PILT payments within its political boundaries. States deciding to come under this subsection may redistribute and reallocate such payments, in whole or part, to other smaller units of general purpose government.

I point this out because the law is very specific regarding the redistribution and reallocation of PILT payments. It is clear that if a smaller unit of local government is to qualify for PILT payments, it must meet all of the following conditions.

One. It must be "located within the boundaries of the larger unit of general local government."

Two. It must "provide general governmental services."

Three. It must "contain entitlement lands within (its) boundaries."

Any reallocation or redistribution made by a State must "generally reflect the level of services provided by, and the number of entitlement acres within, the smaller unit of general local government. Furthermore, no provision of the amendment under discussion authorizes a State to retain, in whole or in part, the PILT payment made by the Secretary of the Interior. In fact, the law is clear that once a payment is made by the Secretary of the Interior to a State:

It shall be the responsibility of such state to make any further distribution of the payment pursuant to subsection (a).

I submitted additional language on this measure which was incorporated into Public Law 98-63 during the conference committee. The language reads as follows:

Such redistribution (by a state) shall be made within 30 days after receipt of such payment. No payment, or portion thereof, made by the Secretary shall be used by any state for the administration of this subsection or subsection (a).

It was my intent when drafting this provision to restrict the potential of PILT payments being distributed in any other manner than has occurred prior to the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals decision. In essence, it was my intent to require the States that decide to use subsection (a), to assume any and all costs of administering the program. This includes costs of generating their own data base to determine payments, as well as costs of surveying lands and services to insure that all applicants for these funds fully qualify under the provisions of Public Law 98-63. It was further my intent to require a State under subsection (a) to distribute to units of local government, 100 percent of the PILT payments made by the Secretary to such State. In addition, a State cannot require the receiving unit of local government to assume any costs of administering the further distribution of payments, nor can a receiving unit of local government volunteer to assume these costs.

I would also like to point out that my amendment was intended to be interpreted in conjunction with the definition of "governmental services" as provided in the Senate amendment on this matter. That amendment reads as follows:

. . . The term "governmental services" includes, but is not limited to, those services that relate to public safety, environment, housing, social services, transportation, and governmental administration."

This amendment is a minimum standard requirement which must be achieved in order for receipt of PILT payments as provided in Public Law 98-63. In the overwhelming majority of cases, the only units of local government that can meet this qualification would be county governments. My amendment places further restrictions to insure that county governments receiving PILT payments prior to the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals decision would continue to receive such payments. In view of the qualifications required under this new law, I would strongly recommend that any State desiring to accept the authority to redistribute PILT payments should closely examine the benefits gained in relation to the costs of accepting this responsibility.●

LETTER FROM BIRMINGHAM JAIL

HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, 16 years ago today, Martin Luther King was assassinated, and the world has yet to recover. In the wake of political turmoil, violent terrorist acts begetting more violence, and squelching silent voices crying out for freedom around the world, let us recapture the spirit of Martin Luther King and his nonviolent deeds that spurred the civil rights movement on. May his dream live on in each of us.

In remembering Dr. King, I ask that you take another look at his timely "Letter From Birmingham Jail."

APRIL 16, 1963.

MY DEAR FELLOW CLERGYMEN: While confined here in the Birmingham city jail, I came across your recent statement calling my present activities "unwise and untimely." Seldom do I pause to answer criticism of my work and ideas. If I sought to answer all the criticisms that cross my desk, my secretaries would have little time for anything other than such correspondence in the course of the day, and I would have no time for constructive work. But since I feel that you are men of genuine good will and that your criticisms are sincerely set forth, I want to try to answer your statement in what I hope will be patient and reasonable terms.

I think I should indicate why I am here in Birmingham, since you have been influenced by the view which argues against "outsiders coming in." I have the honor of serving as president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, an organization operating in every southern state, with headquarters in Atlanta, Georgia. We have some eighty-five affiliated organizations across the South, and one of them is the Alabama Christian Movement for Human Rights. Frequently we share staff, educational and financial resources with our affiliates. Several months ago the affiliate here in Birmingham asked us to be on call to engage in a nonviolent direct-action program if such were deemed necessary. We readily consented, and when the hour came we lived up to our promise. So I, along with several members of my staff, am here because I was invited here. I am here because I have organizational ties here.

But more basically, I am in Birmingham because injustice is here. Just as the prophets of the eighth century B.C. left their villages and carried their "thus saith the Lord" far beyond the boundaries of their home towns, and just as the Apostle Paul left his village of Tarsus and carried the gospel of Jesus Christ to the far corners of the Greco-Roman world, so am I compelled to carry the gospel of freedom beyond my own home town. Like Paul, I must constantly respond to the Macedonian call for aid.

Moreover, I am cognizant of the interrelatedness of all communities and states. I cannot sit idly by in Atlanta and not be concerned about what happens in Birmingham. Injustice anywhere is a threat to justice everywhere. We are caught in an inescapable network of mutuality, tied in a single garment of destiny. Whatever affects one directly, affects all indirectly. Never again can we afford to live with the narrow, provincial "outside agitator" idea. Anyone who lives inside the United States can never by considered an outsider anywhere within its bounds.

You deplore the demonstrations taking place in Birmingham. But your statement, I am sorry to say, fails to express a similar concern for the conditions that brought about the demonstrations. I am sure that none of you would want to rest content with the superficial kind of social analysis that deals merely with effects and does not grapple with underlying causes. It is unfortunate that demonstrations are taking place in Birmingham, but it is even more unfortunate that the city's white power structure left the Negro community with no alternative.

In any nonviolent campaign there are four basic steps: collection of the facts to determine whether injustices exist; negotiation; self-purification; and direct action. We have gone through all these steps in Birmingham. There can be no gain-saying the fact that racial injustice engulfs this community. Birmingham is probably the most thoroughly segregated city in the United States. Its ugly record of brutality is widely known. Negroes have experienced grossly unjust treatment in the courts. There have been more unsolved bombings of Negro homes and churches in Birmingham than in any other city in the nation. These are the hard, brutal facts of the case. On the basis of these conditions, Negro leaders sought to negotiate with the city fathers. But the latter consistently refused to engage in good-faith negotiation.

You may well ask: "Why direct action? Why sit-ins, marches and so forth? Isn't negotiation a better path?" You are quite right in calling for negotiation. Indeed, this is the very purpose of direct action. Nonviolent direct action seeks to create such a crisis and foster such a tension that a community which has constantly refused to negotiate is forced to confront the issue. It seeks so to dramatize the issue that it can no longer be ignored. My citing the creation of tension as part of the work of the nonviolent-resister may sound rather shocking. But I must confess that I am not afraid of the word "tension." I have earnestly opposed violent tension, but there is a type of constructive, nonviolent tension which is necessary for growth. Just as Socrates felt that it was necessary to create a tension in the mind so that individuals could rise from the bondage of myths and half-truths to the unfettered realm of creative analysis and objective appraisal, so must we see the need for nonviolent gadflies to create the kind of tension in society that will help men rise from the dark depths of prejudice and racism to the majestic heights of understanding and brotherhood.

The purpose of our direct-action program is to create a situation so crisis-packed that it will inevitably open the door to negotiation. I therefore concur with you in your call for negotiation. Too long has our beloved Southland been bogged down in a tragic effort to live in monologue rather than dialogue.

We have waited for more than 340 years for our constitutional and God-given rights. The nations of Asia and Africa are moving with jetlike speed toward gaining political independence, but we still creep at horse-and-buggy pace toward gaining a cup of coffee at a lunch counter. Perhaps it is easy for those who have never felt the stinging darts of segregation to say, "Wait." But when you have seen vicious mobs lynch your mothers and fathers at will and drown your sisters and brothers at whim; when you have seen hate-filled policemen curse, kick and even kill your black brothers and sisters; when you see the vast majority of your twenty million Negro brothers smothering in an airtight cage of poverty in the midst of an affluent society; when you suddenly find your tongue twisted and your speech stammering as you seek to explain to your six-year-old daughter why she can't go to the public amusement park that has just been advertised on television, and see tears welling up in her eyes when she is told that Funtown is closed to colored children, and see ominous clouds of inferiority beginning to form in her little mental sky, and see her beginning to distort her personality by developing an unconscious bitterness toward white people; when you have to concoct an answer for a five-year-old son who is asking: "Daddy, why do white people treat colored people so mean?"; when you take a cross-country drive and find it necessary to sleep night after night in the uncomfortable corners of your automobile because no motel will accept you; when you are humiliated day in and day out by nagging signs reading "white" and "colored"; when your first name becomes "nigger," your middle name becomes "boy" (however old you are) and your last name becomes "John," and your wife and mother are never given the respected title "Mrs."; when you are harried by day and haunted by night by the fact that you are a Negro, living constantly at tiptoe stance, never quite knowing what to expect next, and are plagued with inner fears and outer resentments; when you are forever fighting a degenerating sense of "nobodiness"—then you will understand why we find it difficult to wait. There comes a time when the cup of endurance runs over, and men are no longer willing to be plunged into the abyss of despair. I hope, sirs, you can understand our legitimate and unavoidable impatience.

I must make two honest confessions to you, my Christian and Jewish brothers. First, I must confess that over the past few years I have been gravely disappointed with the white moderate. I have almost reached the regrettable conclusion that the Negro's great stumbling block in his stride toward freedom is not the White Citizen's Counciler or the Ku Klux Klanner, but the white moderate, who is more devoted to "order" than to justice; who prefers a negative peace which is the absence of tension to a positive peace which is the presence of justice; who constantly says: "I agree with you in the goal you seek, but I cannot agree with your methods of direct action"; who paternalistically believes he can set the timetable for another man's freedom; who lives by a mythical concept of time and who constantly advises the Negro to wait for a "more convenient season." Shallow understanding from people of good will is more frustrating than absolute misunderstanding from people of ill will. Lukewarm acceptance is much more bewildering than outright rejection.

I had hoped that the white moderate would understand that law and order exist for the purpose of establishing justice and that when they fail in this purpose they become the dangerously structured dams that block the flow of social progress. I had hoped that the white moderate would understand that the present tension in the South is a necessary phase of the transition from an obnoxious negative peace, in which the Negro passively accepted his unjust plight, to a substantive and positive peace, in which all men will respect the dignity and worth of human personality. Actually, we who engage in nonviolent direct action are not the creators of tension. We merely bring to the surface the hidden tension that is already alive. We bring it out in the open, where it can be seen and dealt with. Like a boil that can never be cured so long as it is covered up but must be opened with all its ugliness to the natural medicines of air and light, injustice must be exposed, with all the tension its exposure creates, to the light of human conscience and the air of national opinion before it can be cured.

Oppressed people cannot remain oppressed forever. The yearning for freedom eventually, manifests itself, and that is what has happened to the American Negro. Something within has reminded him of his birthright of freedom, and something without has reminded him that it can be gained. Consciously or unconsciously, he has been caught up by the Zeitgeist, and with his black brothers of Africa and his brown and yellow brothers of Asia, South America and the Caribbean, the United States Negro is moving with a sense of great urgency toward the promised land of racial justice. If one recognizes this vital urge that has engulfed the Negro community, one should readily understand why public demonstrations are taking place. The Negro has many pent-up resentments and latent frustrations, and he must release them. So let him march; let him make prayer pilgrimages to the city hall; let him go on freedom rides—and try to understand why he must do so. If his repressed emotions are not released in nonviolent ways, they will seek expression through violence; this is not a threat but a fact of history. So I have not said to my people: "Get rid of your discontent." Rather, I have tried to say that this normal and healthy discontent can be channeled into the creative outlet of nonviolent direct action. And now this approach is being termed extremist.

Let me take note of my other major disappointment. I have been so greatly disappointed with the white church and its leadership. Of course, there are some notable exceptions. I am not unmindful of the fact that each of you has taken some significant stands on this issue. I commend you, Reverend Stallings, for your Christian stand on this past Sunday, in welcoming Negroes to your worship service on a nonsegregated basis. I commend the Catholic leaders of this state for integrating Spring Hill College several years ago.

But despite these notable exceptions, I must honestly reiterate that I have been disappointed with the church. I do not say this as one of those negative critics who can always find something wrong with the church. I say this as a minister of the gospel, who loves the church; who was nutured in its bosom; who has been sustained by its spiritual blessings and who will remain true to it as long as the cord of life shall lengthen.

When I was suddenly catapulted into the leadership of the bus protest in Montgomery, Alabama, a few years ago, I felt we would be supported by the white church. I felt that the white ministers, priests and rabbis of the South would be among our strongest allies. Instead, some have been outright opponents, refusing to understand the freedom movement and misrepresenting its leaders; all too many others have been more cautious than courageous and have remained silent behind the anesthetizing security of stained-glass windows.

In spite of my shattered dreams, I came to Birmingham with the hope that the white religious leadership of this community would see the justice of our cause and, with deep moral concern, would serve as the channel through which our just grievances could reach the power structure. I had hoped that each of you would understand. But again I have been disappointed.

I have heard numerous southern religious leaders admonish their worshipers to comply with a desegregation decision because it is the law, but I have longed to hear white ministers declare: "Follow this decree because integration is morally right and because the Negro is your brother." In the midst of blatant injustices inflicted upon the Negro, I have watched white churchmen stand on the sideline and mouth pious irrelevancies and sanctimonious trivialities. In the midst of a mighty struggle to rid our nation of racial and economic injustice, I have heard many ministers say: "Those are social issues, with which the gospel has no real concern." And I have watched many churches commit themselves to a completely other-worldly religion which makes a strange, un-Biblical distinction between body and soul, between the sacred and the secular.

Before closing I feel impelled to mention one other point in your statement that has troubled me profoundly. You warmly commended the Birmingham police force for keeping "order" and "preventing violence." I doubt that you would have so warmly commended the police force if you had seen its dogs sinking their teeth into unarmed, nonviolent Negroes. I doubt that you would so quickly commend the policemen if you were to observe their ugly and inhumane treatment of Negroes here in the city jail; if you were to watch them push and curse old Negro women and young Negro girls; if you were to see them slap and kick old Negro men and young boys; if you were to observe them, as they did on two occasions, refuse to give us food because we wanted to sing our grace together. I cannot join you in your praise of the Birmingham police department.

It is true that the police have exercised a degree of discipline in handling the demonstrators. In this sense they have conducted themselves rather "nonviolently" in public. But for what purpose? To preserve the evil system of segregation.

Over the past few years I have consistently preached that nonviolence demands that the means we use must be as pure as the ends we seek. I have tried to make clear that it is wrong to use immoral means to attain moral ends. But now I must affirm that it is just as wrong, or perhaps even more so, to use moral means to preserve immoral ends. Perhaps Mr. Connor and his policemen have been rather nonviolent in public, as was Chief Pritchett in Albany, Georgia, but they have used the moral means of nonviolence to maintain the immoral end of racial injustice. As T. S. Eliot has said: "The last temptation is the greatest treason: To do the right deed for the wrong reason."

Never before have I written so long a letter. I'm afraid it is much too long to take your precious time. I can assure you that it would have been much shorter if I had been writing from a comfortable desk, but what else can one do when he is alone in a narrow jail cell, other than write long letters, think long thoughts and pray long prayers?

If I have said anything in this letter that overstates the truth and indicates an unreasonable impatience, I beg you to forgive me. If I have said anything that understates the truth and indicates my having a patience that allows me to settle for anything less than brotherhood, I beg God to forgive me.

I hope this letter finds you strong in the faith. I also hope that circumstances will soon make it possible for me to meet each of you, not as an integrationist or a civil-rights leader but as a fellow clergyman and a Christian brother. Let us all hope that the dark clouds of racial prejudice will soon pass away and the deep fog of misunderstanding will be lifted from our fear-drenched communities, and in some not too distant tomorrow the radiant stars of love and brotherhood will shine over our great nation with all their scintillating beauty.

Yours for the cause of Peace and Brotherhood,

THE RETIREMENT OF FRED J. REINHARDT

HON. ALFRED A. (AL) McCANDLESS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mr. McCANDLESS. Mr. Speaker, one of the greatest ongoing pleasures I had while a Riverside, Calif., county supervisor for 12 years was the opportunity to work with Fred J. Reinhardt, manager of the Riverside County Department of Development.

Fred will be retiring on April 30 after 24 years of service to the county, and although he will be accepting special assignments and overseeing the completion of current projects, county government just will not seem the same without him.

Fred's list of accomplishments, both personal and on behalf of Riverside County, fills several pages. One of his most lasting accomplishments, however, will be the remarkable industrial and business growth he watchdogged during the past 15 years. South Los Angeles County just kept moving farther south, until one day, a number of former Los Angelenos were new Riverside residents, and a number of businesses came along with them. New business has always been one of Fred's specialties, and it is not hard to understand why he was able to help attract so much industry. Riverside County is the only county in California which regularly sends out community economic profiles for 19 incorporated cities and 3 areas, as well as detailed taxable retail sales data for each city and major area; detailed building permit information for each city and unincorporated area; an instant site selector based on 22 community economic profiles; an overall economic development plan which is revised annually; and helpful, detailed unpublished census data for 1980.

While doing all that, Fred managed to be always available for help and guidance whenever it was needed. Just recently, he and his staff gave me invaluable assistance in conducting an all-day Federal procurement conference in Riverside, and I am sure he had 20 other irons in the fire at the same time.

He and his lovely wife Kay deserve some time to do all the things they have probably postponed because of their hectic schedule, and I wish them well. However, I have a feeling that if Fred is needed, retirement or not, he will be there. Thank you, Fred, for a job well done.●

FEDERAL DEFICIT

HON. JACK F. KEMP

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, this is a calm, reasoned analysis that defies conventional wisdom on the deficit. I commend it to my colleagues who seem to think that deficits are the sole cause of interest rates.

The article follows:

[From the Chicago Tribune, Feb. 5, 1984]

HOW DANGEROUS IS FEDERAL DEFICIT?

(By Stephen Chapman)

The bracing news is out: President Reagan's 1985 budget will be in the red by roughly $180 billion, which as we should all know by now is equal to all the deficits accumulated from 400 B.C. to 1979, or enough dollar bills to reach all the way to Alpha Centauri. Keynesian economists, East Coast editorial writers and members of Congress from both sides of the aisle are rending their garments in despair. So it's time for some clear thought on the subject.

Not that such matters of accounting stir much interest in the public at large. The last poll I saw found that three of every four Americans didn't know the federal budget had a deficit. If the economic recovery proceeds robustly—no safe bet as long as Paul Volcker is within reach of the monetary levers—most people wouldn't care if the entire budget were paid for with borrowed funds. If not, Ronald Reagan could boast a $180 billion surplus and it wouldn't save him.

Much of the professed concern about the deficit is directed at an illusory target. It's not unreasonable to expect a large deficit to raise interest rates—though many distinguished economists argue otherwise, partly because they've found no empirical basis for the assumption. But measuring the deficit is trickier than you might think.

For one thing, the huge dollar figures being batted around don't tell much about the burden the deficit places on the economy. What's important is the deficit as a share of the gross national product. By that measure, the projected 1985 deficit is hardly worse than in some past years, like 1976. More important, the total national debt is lower as a share of GNP than it was under President Eisenhower, and is about the same as in the mid-1960s, a period of enviable prosperity.

The federal deficit figures also don't correct for the erosion of the real value of the debt by inflation, which has been reduced but certainly not conquered. Nor do they reveal how much government borrowing is going on. It's generally forgotten that state and local governments as a group are running a handsome surplus—$51 billion last year—which substantially relieves any pressure that might be created by federal borrowing.

Another problem is that the $180 billion deficit for the next fiscal year is, at this point, merely an estimate, while the deficits being predicted for later years are pure fantasy. The government's receipts and expenses depend heavily on factors that can't be known in advance—employment, corporate profits, inflation, interest rates and the like. Calculating the deficit a few months in advance is dicey; calculating it years in advance is foolhardy. A few years of healthy economic growth, of the sort we enjoyed in the 1960s, would make the deficit disappear.

That's another way of saying the deficit is cyclical (the product of the economy's erratic behavior) rather than structural (the result of Reagan's fiscal policies). Economist Robert Barro of the University of Chicago says the entire deficit can be ascribed to two problems: the economy's sluggish performance, which cuts revenues while raising expenses, and the fear of inflation, which boosts interest rates and thus the cost of servicing the debt. Raising taxes, as Reagan's critics propose, wouldn't solve the latter and would aggravate the former.

What should concern Americans is not the level of the deficit but the level of government spending. That, and not the means of financing the expenditures, is the true drain on the nation's resources. Here there is ample reason for alarm. Spending has grown from an average of 21.4 percent of GNP in the 1970s to 24 percent this year.

Reagan's tax cuts, by contrast, have barely offset tax increases brought about by inflation and legislation. Federal tax revenues are as high now as they were in the 1970s, and they will grow in the coming years. The deficit is due mainly to increases in spending, not to reductions in taxes.

Without the deficit, it's safe to assume that spending would have grown even faster. The only brake on the rapacity of Congress and the President is their reluctance to go even further into debt. If they would approve 1984 expenditures of $854 billion even with receipts of only $670 billion, how much would they spend if they had more money?

In that respect, then, the deficit is not merely innocuous but positively beneficial. Any return to long-term prosperity rests on halting the growth of spending and taxes, or, better still, reducing them outright. Reagan's tax cuts finally arrested the expansion of the tax burden. Repealing them is no way to contain spending.

[From Business Week, Mar. 12, 1984]

A Spending Slowdown Could Temper This Year's Deficit

While the prospect of huge budget deficits continues to haunt the financial markets, the actual deficit picture is apparently improving more rapidly than originally projected. "The Administration's estimate of a $184 billion deficit in fiscal 1984 seems to be unduly pessimistic," says economist Edward S. Hyman Jr. of Cyrus J. Lawrence Inc.

Hyman notes that federal spending outpaced revenues by only $5.15 billion in January, equivalent to a $142 billion seasonally adjusted annual pace (chart). He also calculates that the deficit during the past four months—one-third of the current fiscal year—ran at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of $160 billion.

Why the brightening deficit outlook? Economist Carl R. Crego of Rinfret Associates Inc. points out that "tax revenues are pouring into the government's coffers at a stronger pace than anticipated." Corporate income tax receipts, for example, are running 55 percent higher this year than in fiscal 1983.

More significant, says Hyman are signs of a "surprising slowdown in spending." Federal expenditures in January, in fact, were only 1.4 percent higher than in January, 1983. Hyman theorizes that this apparent "underspending" is due both to unexpectedly low inflation and to the Administration's stress on controlling expenditures.

Whatever happens later this year, Hyman thinks recent deficit trends are already affecting the economy. "The improved deficit picture translates into lower near-term government credit demands and a reduction of fiscal stimulus," he asys. "And that increases the chances of modest decline in interest rates in the months ahead."●

SETON HALL LEGISLATIVE BUREAU, AN OUTSTANDING INSTITUTION

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a moment to recognize the Seton Hall Legislative Bureau, a unique clinical course given at the Seton Hall School of Law, which promotes service to the government while furthering the legal education of students. Instituted in 1973, the program gives individuals interested in elected office or staff positions in State and Federal legislatures firsthand experience in the field.

The program focuses on three activities: Research and actual drafting of legislation; writing articles for the Journal, a law review styled publication; and serving an internship in a legislative office. The three are supplemented by a class devoted to improving technical research and drafting skills.

The educational value is extraordinary—students work in a professional atmosphere, helping to draft legislation and write articles for possible publication in the Journal. This outstanding training program also provides an invaluable service to the State by supplying legislative offices with well-educated, hardworking individuals to assist them.

The program's publication, the Journal has improved in quality and quantity since its first issue in 1974. Examining the effects of legislation enacted in New Jersey, this publication can now be found in the libraries of all New Jersey judges and legislatures. It recently won the distinction of being included in the "Index to Legal Periodicals."

The success rate of individuals coming out of the program is excellent with people going directly into elected politics; the majority of individuals assuming staff positions upon graduation; and the remaining entering the private work force.

I can do nothing but praise this fine institution that has become a tradition at the Seton Hall Law School. By encouraging student involvement in our governing process, it has better prepared the future leaders of New Jersey and our country.●

OF TEXAS

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mr. PAUL. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, some of my colleagues took advantage of a special order to discuss social security and some comments our President made regarding the future solvency of the program. Frankly, I was surprised at some of the charges my colleagues made about our President and his actions with regard to medicare and social security. However, after a bit of checking, I discovered that some of the comments of my colleagues had little basis in fact.

The charge was made that "in every year since 1981, this administration has cut billions of dollars from medicare." In fact, spending on both medicare and social security has continued to increase, and at rates similar to those of previous administrations. Contrary to popular mythology, billions more have been spent on both medicare and social security every year.

Making an analogy, one of my distinguished colleagues compared social security with the Army. It is true that once you are in either social security or the Army you cannot get out. But at least the Army is based on voluntary entry. This is certainly more than can be said for social security. It is sad that a Member of this body, one in a leadership position to boot, embraces the concept of coercion and force when it comes to the retirement programs of our senior citizens. What is so objectionable about giving American citizens the free choice when it comes to retirement planning?

Only through free choice in retirement can the hostages of Government programs be truly secure when they are older. America is, indeed, like a community where we help people who need to be helped. It is a shame that some of my colleagues reject the community-based concept of voluntarism in favor of the impersonal and coercive nature of the welfare state.●

LEGISLATION DEALING WITH THE TAX TREATMENT OF TRANSFERS INCIDENT TO DIVORCE

HON. SILVIO O. CONTE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced legislation today which would correct what I believe is an inequity in the present law tax treatment of transfers of property incident to divorce.

Under present law, a transfer of appreciated property between divorced spouses generally gives rise to a taxable gain to the transferor; the transferee receives the transferor's stepped-up basis in the property. The term "stepped-up basis" generally means the value of the property at the time of the transfer; any tax is imposed on the value of the property at the time of the initial transfer, less the transferor's initial basis (cost).

In the case of transfers of property incident to divorce, the present law tax treatment is principally derived from a 1962 Supreme Court decision directly on point. The Supreme Court held in United States v. Davis (370 U.S. 65) that the transfer of an appreciated asset to a spouse or former spouse for the release of marital claims results in the recognition of gain to the transferor spouse. This is true even though, in general, transfers between a married couple—for example, a gift of land from a husband to a wife—are not taxable.

An example of the effect of the 1962 decision is a situation like this: In 1975, Mr. X and Mrs. Y are married. At the time of the marriage, Mr. X purchased stock in a company for $5,000. In 1982, Mr. X and Mrs. Y are divorced; at that time, the stock is worth $12,000. A part of the divorce decree requires Mr. X to transfer the appreciated stock to Mrs. Y. Under the Supreme Court decision, Mr. X faces a capital gains tax on his stepped-up basis: $7,000.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that it is inappropriate to tax transfers between spouses, because a husband and wife are a single economic unit. The Davis rules have proved a trap for the unwary, as, for example, where the parties view the property acquired during marriage—even though held in one spouse's name—as jointly owned, only to find that the equal division of property upon divorce triggers recognition of gain.

I applaud the actions of the Committee on Ways and Means, which has included, as a part of the Tax Reform Act, a provision which would essentially overturn the Davis decision. Unfortunately, however, this provision only applies to transfers of property occurring after enactment of the bill. This does not help those individuals who were caught in the Davis trap.

Most distressing is the case of individuals who are ordered to transfer appreciated property by a court decree; those spouses have no choice but to accept the decree and face a potentially huge tax liability. Thus, my legislation provides that a transfer of property between a spouse and former spouse incident to divorce will not give rise to a taxable gain or loss. The transferee will receive the transferor's adjusted basis in the property. My bill differs from the Ways and Means proposal in that, although it would be generally effective on enactment, in the case of a transfer of property pursuant to court order, the provisions of the bill would apply regardless if the transfer occurred before, on or after the date of enactment. In the case of transfers made not pursuant to court order, both spouses would have to elect to have these rules apply.

As well, if the transferred property has been sold by the transferee prior to enactment of my bill, for a gain over the transferor's basis, no additional tax will be imposed on the transferee. This is because, under prior law, the transferee received the transferor's stepped-up basis, whereas my legislation provides for carryover basis. Had the transferee sold the property for a gain over the stepped-up basis—as opposed to the carryover basis—an additional tax liability would technically result on enactment of this legislation. This additional tax is waived under the bill.

Mr. Speaker, I feel this is equitable and fair legislation, and hope that it can be enacted—perhaps by attaching it to the Tax Reform Act. I have written to Senator DOLE and have urged him to consider adding my bill to the tax bill. I urge its quick enactment.●

DO U.S. DEFICITS CAUSE HIGH INTEREST RATES?

HON. JACK F. KEMP

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 4, 1984

● Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, the following is of deficits and answers the question:

AN INTERNATIONAL COMPARISON: DO U.S. DEFICITS CAUSE HIGH INTEREST RATES?

(By Bruce Bartlett)

There is a view which seems common throughout the world, and in the U.S. as well, that U.S. budget deficits are far out of line with other nations and that this is the major reason for high world interest rates. An examination of the data, however, paints a different picture.

Until 1982 the U.S. budget deficit, including federal, state and local governments, both as a share of GNP and gross private saving, was lower than in virtually every other major industrialized nation. Moreover, these data confirm the claims made by the U.S. Treasury Department and many leading economists that budget deficits simply do not correlate with either real or nominal interest rates.

As Table 1 demonstrates, the U.S.'s government deficit, even at its highest level, is not out of line with other industrialized nations. From 1978 through 1981 the U.S. deficit as a share of GNP was lower than in every other major industrialized nation. Even in 1982, at the peak of the recession which caused spending to rise and GNP growth to fall, the U.S. deficit was smaller than the average for all industrialized nations and about the same as Germany and Japan. While Britain's deficit was much lower, Canada's was much higher.

TABLE 1.—GOVERNMENT DEFICIT AS A SHARE OF GNP

Country	1978	1979	1980	1981	1982
United States		−0.6	1.3	1.0	3.8
Japan	5.5	4.8	4.2	3.9	3.7
Germany	2.5	2.8	3.1	4.0	3.9
Canada	3.2	1.9	2.1	1.2	5.3
United Kingdom	4.2	3.1	3.3	2.5	1.6
Average [1]	2.3	1.9	2.4	2.7	4.1

Source: IMF.

Another line of argument which is often advanced is that although deficits as a share of GNP may not be out of line, U.S. deficits as a share of saving are, owing to a lower U.S. savings rate. Again, the data do not support this view.

As Table 2 shows, until 1982 the U.S. deficit as a share of gross private saving was significantly lower than in virtually every other industrialized country.

TABLE 2.—GOVERNMENT DEFICIT AS A SHARE OF SAVING

County	1978	1979	1980	1981	1982
United States		0.4	8	6	22
Japan	17	16	15	13	13
Germany	13	14	16	20	19
Canada	14	8	9	5	22
United Kingdom	20	16	18	15	9
Average	11	9	12	13	20

In 1981, for example, the U.S. budget deficit absorbed just 6 per cent of private saving, compared to 13 per cent in Japan, 20 per cent in Germany, 15 per cent in Great Britian, and an average of 13 per cent for all industrialized nations. Even in 1982, when the U.S. deficit shot up significantly, the U.S. deficit's share of saving was only slightly larger than the average.

The international data fail to give support to those who believe that government budget deficits are the major determinant of interest rates. As one can see from Table

3, there are many years in which deficits were rising, either as a share of GNP or saving, and interest rates fell, whether measured by nominal (money) rates or adjusted for inflation to yield a "real" interest rate.

TABLE 3.—NOMINAL AND REAL INTEREST RATES

United States	7.2	(−.2)	10.1	(1.3)	11.4	(1.9)	14.0	(4.2)	10.6	(4.4)
Japan	5.1	(0.4)	5.9	(3.2)	10.7	(7.7)	7.7	(4.9)	7.1	(4.9)
Germany	3.7	(−.5)	6.7	(2.5)	9.5	(4.9)	12.7	(7.6)	8.9	(3.9)
Canada	8.8	(2.2)	12.1	(1.6)	13.2	(1.9)	18.3	(7.4)	14.2	(3.2)
United Kingdom	6.8	(−2.2)	9.2	(−1.8)	11.7	(−3.4)	13.3	(0.7)	10.9	(3.1)
Average	6.9	(−1.4)	9.5	(−)	12.4	(0.6)	14.4	(3.7)	12.9	(3.0)

Note: Real interest rate appears in parentheses and equals the nominal rate less the increase in the GNP deflator.

In Japan, for example, government budget deficits fell sharply from 1978 through 1980, both as a share of GNP and gross saving. However, both real and nominal interest rates skyrocketed during this time, with nominal rates more than doubling and real rates rising more than 19 times!

On the other hand, between 1981 and 1982 budget deficits rose sharply in the U.S. and Canada. Yet, both real and nominal interest rates fell in both countries. The average for all industrialized countries showed a similar pattern. The average budget deficit rose from 2.7 percent of GNP to 4.1 percent and rose as a share of saving from 13 percent to 20 percent. But at the same time, nominal interest rates fell from 14.4 percent to 12.9 percent and real rates fell from 3.7 percent to 3 percent.

The inescapable conclusion is that the U.S. budget deficit cannot be blamed for the rise in world interest rates, as many foreign leaders maintain. Nor does the international data support the view that deficits are really the major determinant of interest rates. While in some cases there seems to be a pattern, in many other cases the exact opposite pattern occurs. Hence, one cannot generalize about the issue, but rather we must look deeper at what is happening in terms of inflation rates, monetary policy and other factors to find out what is actually controlling interest rates at any one time.

The conclusion of this examination of the international data would seem, therefore, to be that we ought not to allow ourselves to be browbeaten by foreign nations for running large budget deficits when their own performance is hardly outstanding. And secondly, we should seriously question the assertion made by Sen. Bob Dole and others that we can expect a decline in interest rates if we simply cut the deficit.●

SENATE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Title IV of Senate Resolution 4, agreed to by the Senate on February 4, 1977, calls for establishment of a system for a computerized schedule of all meetings and hearings of Senate committees, subcommittees, joint committees, and committees of conference. This title requires all such committees to notify the Office of the Senate Daily Digest—designated by the Rules Committee—of the time, place, and purpose of the meetings, when scheduled, and any cancellations or changes in the meetings as they occur.

As an additional procedure along with the computerization of this information, the Office of the Senate Daily Digest will prepare this information for printing in the Extensions of Remarks section of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Monday and Wednesday of each week.

Any changes in committee scheduling will be indicated by placement of an asterisk to the left of the name of the unit conducting such meetings.

Meetings scheduled for Thursday, April 5, 1984, may be found in the Daily Digest of today's RECORD.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Thursday, April 5, 1984

The House met at 10 a.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

O God of Light, may Your brightness shine upon us and upon those we love. May Your light illumine our faults that we may correct them, may Your light warm our hearts that we will be more caring, may Your light show us the needs of other people that we might do justice, and may Your grace be with us this day and at our final day. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

CONGRATULATIONS TO HERBERT TANZER, PRESIDENT OF AMERICA-ISRAEL FRIENDSHIP LEAGUE

(Mr. ADDABBO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate our former colleague and old friend, Herbert Tanzer, president of the America-Israel Friendship League. Herb recently received the prestigious Dr. Harris J. Levine Award from B'Nai Zion for his work which has strengthened the ties between America and Israel.

The process of bringing about peace in the Middle East is a building process. It requires efforts on many fronts. Herb has been a major force in trying to educate Americans about Israel's position. He has worked to secure a peace between Israel and its Arab neighbors by educating people on this complex subject.

I believe that Herbert Tanzer is an extremely positive example of the dedication required to bring about peace in the sensitive area of the Middle East. We continue to look to him for guidance and offer him my support as a member of the America-Israel Friendship League.

BANKRUPTCY BILL SOLVES PROBLEMS IN MISSOURI

(Mr. SKELTON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, back in my district in Missouri there was a news release sent out by the National Republicans that criticizes my vote on the bankruptcy bill.

Now, what is very interesting, Mr. Speaker, is that this bankruptcy bill solves a problem for Missouri that we have had for some time. It enables the American farmer to cope with the problems we have had in Missouri from bankruptcies in grain elevators. You know, I could not quite figure out what the Republican Party had against protecting the American farmer from bankrupt elevators.

I still have that question, Mr. Speaker.

BUDGET DECISIONS ON SMALL BUSINESS

(Mr. DREIER of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Speaker, Congress has begun the budget process for next year. We are faced with hard choices—our decisions affecting most aspects of the American economy. I want to remind my colleagues that it has been the resiliency of small business that has led our current economic recovery. In the coming weeks we need to pay special attention to the needs of small business so that we are not put in the position of crippling the recovery.

There are 14 million small business firms accounting for more than 98 percent of all business in the United States. Together they produce 40 percent of our GNP, two-thirds of all new private-sector employment increases, and one-half of all new major business innovations.

California can boast 1½ million small businesses—one-third of which employ less than 50 people. This group makes up 94 percent of all business on the west coast.

What these figures add up to, Mr. Speaker, is the fact that a large portion of the economic stability and well-being of this Nation rests in the hands of the small business man and woman. Incidentally, as President Reagan pointed out recently the number of businesses owned by women has increased four times as fast as those owned by men.

In short, and with apologies to Calvin Coolidge, "What's good for small business, is good for America."

CONFERENCE REPORT ON S. 1852, DEFENSE PRODUCTION ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1984

Mr. MINISH submitted the following conference report and statement on the Senate bill (S. 1852) to extend the expiration date of the Defense Production Act of 1950:

CONFERENCE REPORT (H. REPT. No. 98-651)

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1852) to extend the expiration date of the Defense Production Act of 1950, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert the following:

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Defense Production Act Amendments of 1984".

EXTENSION OF THE DEFENSE PRODUCTION ACT OF 1950

SEC. 2. The first sentence of section 717(a) of the Defense Production Act of 1950 (50 U.S.C. App. 2166(a)) is amended by striking out "March 30, 1984" and inserting in lieu thereof "September 30, 1986".

DETERMINATIONS REQUIRED BEFORE THE AWARDING OF FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

SEC. 3. (a) Section 301(a) of the Defense Production Act of 1950 (50 U.S.C. App. 2091(a)) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(3) Except during periods of national emergency declared by the Congress or the President, a guarantee may be entered into under this section only if the President determines that—

"(A) the guaranteed contract or operation is for a material, or the performance of a service, which is essential to the national defense;

"(B) without the guarantee, United States industry cannot reasonably be expected to provide the capability for the needed material or service in a timely manner;

"(C) the guarantee is the most cost-effective, expedient, and practical alternative for meeting the need involved; and

"(D) the United States national defense demand is equal to, or greater than, the output of domestic industrial capability which the President reasonably determines to be available for national defense, including the output to be established through the guarantee.".

(b) Section 302 of the Defense Production Act of 1950 (50 U.S.C. App. 2092) is amended—

(1) by redesignating the first sentence as subsection (a); and

(2) by striking out the second and third sentences and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(b) Such loans may be made without regard to the limitations of existing law and on such terms and conditions as the President deems necessary, except that—

"(1) financial assistance may be extended only to the extent that it is not otherwise available on reasonable terms; and

"(2) except during periods of national emergency declared by the Congress or the President, no such loan may be made unless the President determines that—

"(A) the loan is for the expansion of capacity, the development of a technological process, or the production of materials essential to the national defense;

"(B) without the loan, United States industry cannot reasonably be expected to provide the needed capacity, technological processes, or materials in a timely manner;

"(C) the loan is the most cost-effective, expedient, and practical alternative method for meeting the need; and

"(D) the United States national defense demand is equal to, or greater than, domestic industrial capability which the President reasonably determines to be available for national defense, including the output to be established through the loan.".

(c) Section 303(a) of the Defense Production Act of 1950 (50 U.S.C. App. 2093(a)) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "Except during periods of national emergency declared by the Congress or the President, the President may not execute a contract under this subsection unless the President determines that—

"(1) the mineral, metal, or material is essential to the national defense;

"(2) without Presidential action under authority of this section, United States industry cannot reasonably be expected to provide the capability for the needed mineral, metal, or material in a timely manner;

"(3) purchases, purchase commitments, or other action pursuant to this section are the most cost-effective, expedient, and practical alternative method for meeting the need; and

"(4) the United States national defense demand for the mineral, metal, or material is equal to, or greater than, the output of domestic industrial capability which the President reasonably determines to be available for national defense, including the output to be established through the purchase, purchase commitment, or other action.".

LIMITATIONS OF THE AWARDING OF FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

SEC. 4. (a) Section 301(e)(1) of the Defense Production Act of 1950 (50 U.S.C. App. 2091(e)(1)) is amended to read as follows:

"(e)(1)(A) Except during periods of national emergency declared by the Congress or the President, a guarantee may be made under this section only if the industrial resource shortfall which such guarantee is intended to correct has been identified in the Budget of the United States, or amendments thereto, submitted to the Congress, accompanied by a statement from the President demonstrating that the budget submission is in accordance with the provisions of subsection (a)(3) of this section.

"(B) Any such guarantee may be made only after 60 days have elapsed after such industrial resource shortfall has been identified pursuant to subparagraph (A).

"(C) If the making of any guarantee or guarantees to correct an industrial resource shortfall would cause the aggregate outstanding amount of all guarantees for such industrial resource shortfall to exceed $25,000,000, any such guarantee or guarantees may be made only if specifically authorized by law.".

"(c)(1) No such loan may be made under this section, except during periods of national emergency declared by the Congress or the President, unless the industrial resource shortfall which such loan is intended to correct has been identified in the Budget of the United States, or amendments thereto, submitted to the Congress, accompanied by a statement from the President demonstrating that the budget submission is in accordance with the provisions of subsection (b)(2) of this section.

"(2) Any such loan may be made only after 60 days have elapsed after such industrial resource shortfall has been identified pursuant to paragraph (1).

"(3) If the making of any loan or loans to correct an industrial resource shortfall would cause the aggregate outstanding amount of all loans for such industrial resource shortfall to exceed $25,000,000, any such loan or loans may be made only if specifically authorized by law.".

(c) Section 303(a) of the Defense Production Act of 1950 (50 U.S.C. App. 2093(a)), as amended by section 3(c), is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "Except during periods of national emergency declared by the Congress or the President, the President shall take no action under authority of this section unless the industrial resource shortfall which such action is intended to correct has been identified in the Budget of the United States, or amendments thereto, submitted to the Congress, accompanied by a statement from the President demonstrating that the budget submission is in accordance with the provisions of the preceding sentence. Any such action may be taken only after 60 days have elapsed after such industrial resource shortfall has been identified pursuant to the preceding sentence. If the taking of any action or actions under authority of this section to correct an industrial resource shortfall would cause the aggregate outstanding amount of all such actions for such industrial resource shortfall to exceed $25,000,000, any such action or actions may be taken only if specifically authorized by law.".

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 5. (a) The first sentence of section 711(a) of the Defense Production Act of 1950 (50 U.S.C. App. 2161(a)) is amended by inserting "and paragraph (4)" after "paragraph (2)".

(b) Section 711(a) of the Defense Production Act of 1950 (50 U.S.C. App. 2161(a)) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(4)(A) There are authorized to be appropriated to carry out the provisions of section 303 not to exceed $100,000,000 for fiscal years 1985 and 1986, except that not more than $25,000,000 is authorized to be appropriated for fiscal year 1985.

"(B) The aggregate amount of loans, guarantees, purchase agreements, and other actions under sections 301, 302, and 303 during fiscal years 1985 and 1986 may not exceed $100,000,000.".

REPORTS

SEC. 6. Title III of the Defense Production Act of 1950 (50 U.S.C. App. 2091 et seq.) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"SEC. 309. Not later than 18 months after the date of the enactment of the Defense Production Act Amendments of 1984, and annually thereafter, the President shall submit to the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs of the Senate, a report on the impact of offsets on the defense preparedness, industrial competitiveness, employment, and trade of the United States. Each such report also shall include a discussion of bilateral and multilateral negotiations on offsets in international procurement and provide information on the types, terms, and magnitude of the offsets.".

And the Senate agree to the same.

JOINT EXPLANATORY STATEMENT OF THE COMMITTEE OF CONFERENCE

The managers on the part of the House and the Senate at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1852) to extend the expiration date of the Defense Production Act of 1950, submit the following joint statement to the House and the Senate in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the managers and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The House amendment struck out all of the Senate bill after the enacting clause and inserted a substitute text.

The Senate amendment struck out all of the House amendment and inserted a substitute text.

The House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate with an amendment which is a substitute for the Senate amendment and the House amendment. The differences between the House amendment, the Senate amendment, and the substitute agreed to in conference are noted below, except for clerical corrections, conforming changes made necessary by agreements reached by the conferees, and minor drafting and clarifying changes.

TERMINATION DATE

The House amendment provided that the authorities of the Defense Production Act would terminate on September 30, 1985, a two-year extension from the time the amendment was passed by the House. The Senate amendment set the termination date at September 30, 1988, representing a five-year extension. The conference agreement sets the termination date of the Act's authorities on September 30, 1986, a two-and-one-half year extension from the present termination date of March 30, 1984.

CONGRESSIONAL REVIEW OF PROPOSED TITLE III PROJECTS

Under the provisions of both the Senate and House amendments, the procedures for use of Title III financial incentives to expand domestic capacity and supply of materials and services necessary to the national defense are changed.

Under the provisions of the Senate amendment, any project proposed for Title III funding, regardless of the size of the project or the amount of funding proposed, would require advance authorization by Congress before any funds may be appropriated.

The House amendment also contains the requirement of project-specific advance authorization of appropriations. However, the advance authorization requirement would apply only after an appropriation would exceed certain "threshold" amounts of funding applied to a particular material or service. Funding for a particular Title III project could be obtained by requesting an appropriation under the general authorization of appropriations provision of section 711(a) of the Defense Production Act. However, if the requested appropriation would cause the aggregate outstanding amount of appropriations for the particular material or service which has already been obtained or is requested to exceed the "threshold" amount, an advance authorization for funding for that particular material or service would be required.

The House amendment sets the "threshold" amounts at $38,000,000 for loan guarantees, $48,000,000 for direct loans, and $48,000,000 for purchase agreements.

The conference agreement adopts the House procedure, and sets the "threshold" amounts at $25,000,000 for each of the three types of financial incentives, loans, loan guarantees, and purchase agreements.

Both the Senate and House amendments make additional changes to the use of Title III financial incentives in order to provide adequate opportunity for Congressional review of proposed projects. First, there is a requirement of an advance budget submission to Congress which identifies each proposed project, and which must be accompanied by a Presidential statement demonstrating that the project will meet a set of specified criteria. Second, and in accordance with the conference agreement to adopt the House procedure, in order for any project to go forward, either an authorization or an appropriation, or both, must be obtained. And finally, under the provisions of the House and Senate amendments, before any funds may be obligated for a project there must be a clear finding that the project meets each of the criteria set forth in the amendments. The conferees found that a criterion specified for Presidential determination was technically unworkable, and agreed to eliminate it.

To insure that Congress will have an opportunity to review the final findings, the conference agreement establishes a 60-day waiting period before any funds may be obligated or any contract executed. The requirement reflects the conferees' intent that the Committees of Congress, either the Appropriations Committees or the authorizing committees, or both, have the opportunity to review each project's compliance with the criteria. In particular, the conferees expect that the Appropriations Committees will have the opportunity to review the findings for those projects for which only an appropriation is required.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

The effect of the Senate amendment requiring advance authorization of each project is that no authorization of appropriations would be provided for in the amendment. The effect of the House amendment setting "threshold" amounts is that there would be a continuing general authorization of appropriations under the provisions of section 711(a) of the Act, so long as the appropriations for projects for a particular material or service did not exceed the "threshold" amounts.

Because the conference agreement adopts the House procedure, the conference agreement provides a limited authorization amount covering the two fiscal years which will occur during that Act's extension, that is, fiscal years 1985 and 1986. The amount is $100,000,000, authorized to be appropriated specifically for section 303 purchase agreements. The Administration has indicated that it intends to use only the purchase agreement authority for its proposed Title III programs.

The Administration has requested $25,000,000 for fiscal year 1985 for Title III programs. The conference agreement, therefore, also provides that, of the $100,000,000 authorized to be appropriated over the two fiscal years, not more than $25,000,000 may be appropriated for fiscal year 1985. These authorizations will enable the Administration to take the necessary steps to seek appropriations, and upon obtaining appropriations, to go forward with projects consistent with the Congressional review requirements established by these amendments to Title III.

The conferees intend that the $100,000,000 figure represents a cap on fiscal year 1985 and 1986 Title III actions. The conference agreement, therefore, specifies that the $100,000,000 authorization includes all Title III financial incentives, that is, direct loans and loan guarantees, as well as purchase agreements.

OFFSETS

Since the 1960's, foreign military sales between U.S. corporations and foreign countries have been increasingly negotiated not only on the basis of price and military effectiveness, but also on the acceptance of corollary agreements designed to "offset" the purchase price. In buying U.S. military equipment, purchasing countries are seeking at the same time to increase their own employment, technical knowledge and production capacity.

Offsets can be defined as an entire range of industrial and commercial compensation practices ranging from barter, countercontracts, coproduction, mandatory subcontracting, direct investment, licensing or other techniques for transfer of advanced production processes.

The most common form of offset agreement involves coproduction of military hardware. In this type of arrangement, a U.S. company and a foreign company generally form a joint venture to produce a line of goods in the foreign country using American technology. Another common arrangement involves the seller purchasing non-related goods from the buyer (e.g., consumer goods, foodstuffs, etc.) as a requirement to "offset" whole or part of the military purchase price.

There is little doubt that the practice of offsets is significant, and apparently growing. The question arises as to whether such offsets currently or prospectively constitute a serious adverse effect on U.S. competitiveness, employment and trade. This is a particularly relevant issue at a time of increasing concern over the erosion of the U.S. defense industrial base. However, in attempting to determine what the potential implications and consequences of offset agreements may be, it is apparent that there is no comprehensive data base on which to make an evaluation of the domestic impact of these practices.

Therefore, the conference agreement includes a House-offered provision to require that no later than 18 months after the enactment of the Defense Production Act Amendments of 1984, and annually thereafter, the President shall submit to the House Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs, and the Senate Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs, a report on the impact of offsets on the defense preparedness, industrial competitiveness, employment, and trade of the United States. Such report shall also include a discussion of bilateral and multilateral negotiations on offsets in international procurement and provide information on the types, terms, and magnitude of the offsets.

Since there is no clear lead agency in the Executive Branch on the subject of offsets, it is anticipated that the Office of Management and Budget will coordinate the efforts of the Executive Branch (e.g., the Department of Treasury, the Department of Defense, the Department of Commerce, the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative, and others), in producing such reports.

The conferees intend that information provided on the types, terms, an magnitude of the offsets in each report shall include the number of relevant offset agreements required by contracts, the total dollar amount of value of offsets required by such contracts, a breakdown of offsets by category of defense material or defense services involved in such contracts, and a breakdown of such offsets by recipient countries.

In addition, each report shall contain a summary of relevant Memoranda of Understanding between the United States and foreign countries which provide the official framework within which foreign offset commitments incurred in private sales can be fulfilled. Copies of actual Memoranda of Understanding involving such offsets shall be made available to the House Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs and the Senate Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs upon request, after each report has been submitted by the President.

FIRST CONCURRENT RESOLUTION ON THE BUDGET—FISCAL YEAR 1985

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to House Resolution 476 and rule XXIII, the Chair declares the House in the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the concurrent resolution, House Concurrent Resolution 280.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 280) revising the congressional budget for the U.S. Government for the fiscal year 1984 and setting forth the congressional budget for the U.S. Government for the fiscal years 1985, 1986, and 1987, with Mr. MOAKLEY in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the concurrent resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. When the Committee of the Whole House rose on Wednesday, April 4, 1984, the concurrent resolution was considered as having been read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. No amendments are in order except amendments made in order pursuant to House Resolution 476.

AMENDMENT IN THE NATURE OF A SUBSTITUTE OFFERED BY MR. DIXON

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute, designated No. 4, consisting of the text of House Concurrent Resolution 281.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will designate the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The text of the amendment in the nature of a substitute is as follows:

Amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by Mr. DIXON: Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the Congress hereby determines and declares that the concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1984 is hereby revised and replaced, the first concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1985 is hereby established, and the appropriate budgetary levels for fiscal years 1986 and 1987 are hereby set forth:

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to House Resolution 476, the amendment is considered as having been read.

The gentleman from California (Mr. DIXON) will be recognized for 1 hour, and a Member opposed will be recognized for 1 hour.

The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from California (Mr. DIXON) for 1 hour.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 8 minutes.

For 4 consecutive years the Congressional Black Caucus has developed a constructive budget alternative that offers a fair and equitable balance between stabilizing the economy and providing essential Government services.

This year, CBC offers a budget plan that provides the largest downpayment on the deficit. We make pragmatic spending reductions that will save $142 billion over the next 3 years. In addition, our 3-year deficit reduction package raises $181 billion in additional revenue by modifying tax cuts and eliminating unjustified tax breaks.

In preparing our budget this year, the caucus was mindful that the major problem on the minds of most Americans is our staggering budget deficit.

Today we are faced with budget deficits that are the largest in the history of our country. In 1983 alone, the Reagan administration produced a deficit that exceeds the 4-year total of from 1976–80.

It is clear that the two major components of the deficit are: First, massive revenue losses created by the President's tax cut and second, spending increases for defense.

Yet, none of the other budget plans under consideration by the House address both problems.

Our proposal cuts the deficit further than any other package before this House.

Only yesterday the Congressional Budget Office released a report on the impact of the President's tax and budget policies. It comes as no surprise that low-income families have lost the most money and high-income families have gained the most.

For example, Americans making less than $10,000 per year lost, on average, $390 a year. Americans making between $40,000 and $80,000 gained, on average, approximately $3,000 per year.

The CBC revenue plan eliminates this disparity by limiting the tax cut to the first $50,000 of income and repealing the indexing of income taxes. These two measures will save $87 billion over the next 3 years.

The CBC budget also includes revenue proposals that will increase Federal receipts from corporate income taxes by $82 billion, and from excise and other taxes by $14 billion over the next 3 years.

Defense outlays will account for 30 percent of the entire Federal budget in 1985. Under the administration's defense plan, outlays will account for approximately 35 percent of the Federal budget by 1989.

The CBC budget alternative proposes $235 billion in budget authority for defense. This reflects a $78 billion savings, the majority of which comes from funding reductions for procurement and research and development for unnecessary nuclear weapons systems.

In seriously addressing the revenue and defense problems that are almost solely responsible for our bleak economic outlook, the CBC has proposed an alternative that would cut the Federal budget deficit by $323 billion over the next 3 years.

It is in the area of addressing our national needs that we feel the caucus alternative most strongly differs from the other proposals under consideration.

There are 1.5 million more Americans unemployed than when the President took office. There are 8 million more Americans who have fallen into poverty since the Reagan administration began.

Of domestic cuts proposed by the administration for 1985, 40 percent would come in programs for the poor, although these programs only make up 19 percent of the domestic budget. Overall, programs for the poor would be cut 10 percent below the amounts needed to maintain fiscal year 1984 services levels.

The CBC budget alternative provides a $42 billion increase in nondefense domestic programs in 1985. This increase includes: $11 billion for the Community Renewal Employment Act which passed the House last year, and the Hawkins youth employment bill; this increase also provides additional funds for employment and training programs and unemployment insurance; $5 billion for student financial assistance, a new math and science grant program, comprehensive education for the disadvantaged, and adult and vocational education; $4 billion for food stamp assistance; $3 billion for the AFDC program; $2 billion for the women, infants, and children (WIC) food program, child nutrition, and the child health assurance program (CHAP); $2 billion to fund a 25-percent increase in health care service grants and a 10-percent increase in health research; $2 billion for general housing assistance, housing for the elderly and handicapped, and rural housing program supervisory grants; and $1 billion for low-income energy assistance.

The CBC budget alternative also provides $23 million for continued funding of the Legal Services Corporation.

The members of the Congressional Black Caucus have given serious attention and study to the 1985 budget. We offer what we believe is the most equitable alternative. In this important year, we hope that our colleagues will join us in seeking a new direction for America.

THANK YOU TO CBC STAFF

I would like to also express appreciation to the staffs of the various members of the Black Caucus who worked under Congressman GRAY and Michael Reed of his staff in preparing this alternative. Mike did an excellent job, as did all of the staff, including Andy Bartels, Bill Signer, Dan Lindheim, Cheryl Smith, and Valeri Byrd and Sheila Senesie of the CBC office.

On behalf of the members, I also wish to thank the CBO staff for their excellent cooperation and assistance in putting our budget together.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. DIXON. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. LATTA. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

There was a sheet passed out here which compared the various proposals and on the Dixon proposal it calls for $181 billion in new revenues. Is that accurate?

Mr. DIXON. I have not seen that sheet but I think it is $187 billion.

Mr. LATTA. $187 billion?

Mr. DIXON. Yes.

Mr. LATTA. Has the gentleman any idea as to how we could raise that amount of money?

Mr. DIXON. Yes; we are going to address that. Congressman FAUNTROY will address the additional taxes. Also, as I indicated, there is a rollback in indexing, one, and there is an additional corporate tax and some other tax equity matters. The gentleman from the District of Columbia, Congressman FAUNTROY, will address those.

Mr. LATTA. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. Evidently a quorum is not present.

Members will record their presence by electronic device.

The CHAIRMAN. Three hundred and sixty Members have answered to their names, a quorum is present, and the Committee will resume its business.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATTA) for 1 hour.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from the District of Columbia (Mr. FAUNTROY).

Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Chairman, I rise, of course, in support of the Dixon substitute amendment to the House Budget Committee's first concurrent budget resolution.

During the last colloquy between the gentleman from California and the gentleman from Ohio, the question was raised as to how we propose to raise some $181 billion in additional tax revenues. And I am pleased to respond on behalf of the Congressional Black Caucus to that question.

Mr. Chairman, the tax package included in the Dixon substitute would raise $181 billion over a 3-year period. We suggest this because the current deficit problem that we face in this country is a direct result of the Reagan tax cuts and his 5-year, $2 trillion military buildup. Despite the fact that the Congress was forced to take back $100 billion of that $750 billion raid on the Federal Treasury by rich individuals and major corporations known as Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981.

We remain of the belief that there are major inequities in the President's original tax proposal that need now to be corrected if we are to deal with this enormous deficit, more in deficit spending in 5 years than seven previous Presidents over 35 years have built up.

What the Congressional Black Caucus is offering to the Congress and the people of this country is certainly comfortable to many people. For the fact is that those who benefited most from the Reagan tax cut lost the least in terms of budget cuts; and those who benefited least from the tax cuts, suffered the most in terms of the budget cuts.

Those earning less than $20,000 are actually paying more in Federal taxes than they were previous to the Reagan tax policies, if you take both the social security tax increases and inflation into account.

So the Congressional Black Caucus proposes a number of measures to reclaim resources to reduce our deficit. We propose, for example, the elimination of the indexation of the Tax Code, which is merely an extension of the concept of an across-the-board tax cut. Everybody gets the same percentage of cut in their rates, thus the wealthy get more than those with less income.

We would substitute a progressive tax cut on the first $50,000 of income. Thus, those earning less than $20,000 would receive the largest tax cut in their rates and progressively smaller reductions in the tax rate on earnings up to $50,000 are proposed.

The CBC would also provide work incentives for the working poor. We increase the earned income tax credit to a maximum credit of $800. The current credit is $500. And similarly, the caucus would propose to provide employers with an incentive to hire the structurally unemployed by extending the targeted job tax credit system another 5 years.

The caucus realizes, also, that 80 percent of the tax breaks that went to the corporations of this country went to the major corporations. So we believe that the tax cuts for the corporations enacted in 1981 were overly generous and that in an effort to reduce this enormous deficit the major corporations have to bear their share as well.

In 1950 corporations contributed 28.3 percent of the revenues to our country and individuals contributed 39.2 percent. That was in 1950. In 1982, pursuant to this enormous raid on the Federal Treasury, the corporations contributed a mere 8.1 percent and individuals contributed a whopping 49 percent of the revenues. This is an alarming trend which resulted in corporations eliminating most of their tax liability to the country and individuals now contributing nearly half of all revenues.

So, Mr. Chairman, in the interest of equity and fairness, we have said: Let us establish for our corporations a goal of increasing their corporate tax contributions to at least 15 percent of the revenues. To that end, we adopt fully the Ways and Means tax freeze on remaining installments of the 1981 tax giveaways. However, rather than freeze the current treatment of income earned by Americans working abroad, and on estate and gift taxes, would return to the pre-Reagan era.

Further, the caucus believes that the other tax giveaways enacted as part of the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981 should be repealed.

Mr. Chairman, the Congressional Black Caucus recognizes that the 18 percent of the budget that meets the needs of the least among us in this country absorbed 60 percent of the budget cuts and that the 5-percent, top-income earners in the Nation got 35 percent of the income tax relief over the past 3 years. Our tax proposal therefore appeals for equity. Let us provide an enormous cut in the deficit by a $181 billion rise in taxes, primarily on the rich and those who have benefited most from this raid on the Federal Treasury over the past 3 years at the same time that we reduce the largest deficit in the history of this country, deficits that are threatening our ability to sustain this recovery, by raising the cost of goods produced in America abroad, and thus accelerating the enormous balance of trades deficit that we have that is moving now toward $77 billion. If we do not halt that trend with a serious rise in taxes and a serious cut in defense spending, more and more American jobs will be exported to cheaper labor markets abroad, to the hurt of the working people of the country.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Dixon substitute amendment to the House Budget Committee's first concurrent budget resolution.

This past winter, the Subcommittee on Domestic Monetary Policy of the Banking Committee, which I chair, held field hearings around the country on the state of the economy and the prospects for the recovery. We held hearings in Camden, N.J.; in Fresno, Calif.; in Birmingham, Ala.; in Shreveport, La.; in Brooklyn, N.Y.; in Pittsburgh, Pa.; and here in the District of Columbia. What we learned in these field hearings were two things. First, the recovery so far, while strong overall, has also been spotty, and has not yet reached many sections of the country and many groups in the economy, especially in the black community. Second, both ordinary people and prominent economists are convinced that, as long as we have budget deficits that equal $200 or $300 billion, the prospects for a continuation of the recovery and further reductions of unemployment without inflation beyond this year are bleak indeed.

The Congressional Black Caucus alternative budget, which is incorporated in the Dixon substitute amendment, is the only budget before this Congress that addresses both of these realities. The CBC budget is the only budget that confronts the problems of lingering joblessness and growing pockets of poverty, by increasing the expenditures for Federal education, job-training, health, and poverty programs by $127 billion over the next 3 years. These budget increases are the minimum amount of assistance needed to help train our youth and retrain our displaced workers for new careers. They are the minimum needed to help the millions of families who have slipped into poverty during the past 3 years and to offer hope to the additional millions who have been unable to escape poverty. They are the minimum needed to provide adequate care and assistance to the jobless, the elderly, the very young, the handicapped, and the disabled.

The CBC budget is also the only budget alternative which really tackles the No. 1 obstacle in the way of continued noninflationary growth—the enormous budget deficits created by the Reagan administration's defense and tax policies, which the Congress unfortunately acquiesced 3 years ago. In my subcommittee hearings, we heard time and again about how those enormous deficits are distorting the recovery and threatening its continuation after this year. We heard how those deficits are keeping interest rates higher than they would otherwise have been given current inflation, handicapping investment in new industrial plant and equipment, and crippling our exports and our smokestack industries by contributing to an overvalued dollar. We heard fears from businessmen, farmers, consumers, and workers about what would happen to economic growth if interest rates rose because of the deficit. We heard from economists about the threat that the deficits pose to the recovery, and the need to take major steps this year to reducing those deficits.

More than any other budget before us, the CBC budget addresses those enormous and ominous deficits. If it were adopted, the deficit in fiscal year 1985 would be $154 billion instead of the baseline deficit of $207 billion, or the deficits of $165 billion to $190 billion under other alternatives before us. If it were adopted, the deficit 3 years from now, in fiscal year 1987, would be $106 billion, instead of the baseline deficit of $270 billion, or the deficits of $139 billion to $182 billion under other budget proposals. If Members are serious about reducing the deficit, starting this year, this budget is the one you should support.

In this regard, I would note that Federal Reserve Chairman Paul Volcker has said that the budget deficit should be reduced by $50 billion in fiscal year 1985, and by an additional amount each year thereafter. He has also said that reductions of this size would bring long-term interest rates down by a percentage point this year, and presumably more in the future. The CBC budget is the only budget before us that has this magnitude of deficit reductions. It is thus the only one which is likely to have this kind of impact on interest rates. It is also the budget which is most likely to produce the kind of monetary policy we will need for a continued noninflationary recovery.

I know that some Members may be concerned about how the CBC budget reduces the deficit. It is true that we achieve most of our budget reductions through cuts in defense spending and increases in taxes. However, even with the CBC's defense cuts, defense outlays in fiscal year 1987 will have grown at an average rate of 3 percent in real terms from 1980 levels. The CBC defense budget only looks like a cut when compared with the excessive defense spending of 1983 and 1984, not when viewed from a longer perspective. In regard to taxes, the CBC budget raises revenues in the most sensible fashion: By closing loopholes and broadening the tax base, instead of a tax surcharge or regressive sales or excise taxes. By replacing tax indexing with a targeted tax cut in fiscal year 1986 for lower and middle income people, the CBC budget would also preserve the tax breaks that tax indexing provides these people, without the permanent loss of revenues and excessive benefits for upper income people that indexing entails. Thus, I urge Members to look carefully at what we propose, and not to reject our budget because at first glance it seems to cut defense or raise taxes too much.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. GINGRICH).

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Chairman, I just want to raise one particular question. As I understand the budget of the distinguished gentleman from California, it eliminates indexing, and I think that that raises, for me, an underlying question at two levels. And I take this time deliberately, because I think this is, in many ways, the focal point for a number of Americans who are very concerned about how we are in poverty and how we help people of all races in a true rainbow coalition to get beyond the state of poverty, and there are two underlying problems I have with your approach. The first is, if you look at indexing, indexing is the most powerful single break we have given working Americans. It is the thing which, over time, most helps marginal families who are just beginning to break out. It is the thing which, if you extend it over a 10- or 15-year period, is of the greatest advantage to people who are, let us say, in a two-income family earning $25,000 or $30,000 or $35,000. Inheritance tax does not help those folks. The big tax breaks do not help those folks. And, frankly, your party has controlled the Ways and Means Committee for 30 years, and the tax laws they have written do not help those folks.

But indexing does. If you look at the statistics—and I think this has been the greatest failure of liberal economics and liberal politics in the last 3 years—the fact is that indexing is the one thing no person who really cares about the working poor should touch.

Now, I can understand if you are a liberal putting in a surtax. That makes perfect sense. I can understand if you are a liberal taking out the inheritance tax changes. That makes some real sense. I do not understand how anyone whose genuine concern is for the working poor and for people who are rising from poverty could take out indexing, because if you think about it for a second, anyone who is really rich does not get affected by indexing. They are already in the 50 percent. It is the person who is trying to get rich who is deeply affected.

The second point I want to make, just for a second—and I will yield if I have time or if I can get time, I will yield for some dialog because I want to raise these two questions intellectually for people who are genuinely concerned about poverty and who see the defeat of poverty and the elimination of poverty as their major goal.

It seems to me that you need two basic changes in what has been the liberal assault on poverty in America since World War II. One of those changes, I think, is to focus on how we help people become productive; because, frankly, when people are productive, they make money. Michael Jackson is productive. He is not in poverty. He is doing fine. He is productive in a market where we pay him a lot of money. I have worked with people in the civil service who happen to have come out of poverty who are doing very well, they are doing fine.

Now, you may very well say to me, "We cannot all be rock stars." But I will say this to you: I think that the longer you focus the fight against poverty on an effort to take money away from the middle class and to transfer it to the poor, the more you focus the poor on a political solution, which I think is never going to happen. I do not think we are going to pass today, and I think when we are done with the votes we are not going to pass today, a massive tax increase, I do not think any of the candidates for a massive tax increase are going to win the Presidency, because working Americans are not going to voluntarily tax themselves in large enough quantities.

Furthermore, by focusing the attention of the poor on politics rather than on becoming productive, whether becoming productive is opening a store or opening a factory or becoming successful at some other endeavor—I may have used an example that the gentleman found amusing, but he is going to put a lot of people to work. And my point is this: Historically, groups rise from poverty by focusing on making money, not by focusing on politics, except in the narrower sense of controlling city machines.

I yield to my distinguished friend.

Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Chairman, let me say that I am very impressed by the gentleman's concern for the working poor and for middle-income America, and, therefore, I am confident he is going to support this measure, because when he looks at the fact that while we end indexing, we continue the benefits for the working poor, for 80 percent of the American people who make $50,000 or less, by providing them a progressive income tax that protects the third-year tax benefits for them, and not just the working poor.

If the gentleman is really concerned about the working poor, he is going to support our tax incentive, the extension of the targeted jobs tax credit, so that employers will be encouraged to take people off welfare and off the Federal programs, in order that they might go to work, and become productive. The cost of that is very modest, particularly when we recognize that by closing up some of the other major tax loopholes that have been created over the past 3 years, we deal with that problem.

Mr. GINGRICH. I think the gentleman's point is a valid one in terms of the tax credit. I would recommend you look very carefully, for example, at a new proposal that two Members on our side, Representatives CLINGER and JOHNSON, have proposed, in terms of additional tax credit for retraining and for new training. But I would like the gentleman to look carefully at the one area focused on, because I think when you have a chance later on, I think, frankly, you should be supporting indexing, because over a 10- or 20-year period, it makes an enormous difference in the tax burden on people who are working and rising into the middle class and into the solid middle class, and that was the major point I wanted to make, because I think in the future, when you redraw this, it will be very, very helpful for you to look at indexing as the one thing I do not think you should be attacking because I think that your own values will lead you to favor it.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. If the gentleman can get time, I will be glad to continue and yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DELLUMS. I thank my colleague for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to respond to just one narrow point. The gentleman suggested that we should not focus poor people's attention on the process of politics. I believe that politics is omnipresent. Politics is all-pervasive; even the air we breathe is a political statement because it is a political decision as how much pollution we will permit.

So politics is there. I would simply suggest this: That poor people have been forced to carry the burden of poverty and the burden of oppression. We should not force them to carry the burden of ignorance. We have a responsibility to help educate our people.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. KEMP).

Mr. KEMP. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, I wanted to take this time to strongly endorse the basic idea behind the budget of the Congressional Black Caucus. On page 2 it says, "The Congressional Black Caucus believes that fighting joblessness must be our first priority."

I agree Mr. Chairman and I say to my friends you ought to let us agree; it ought not to cause any rancor or acrimony on the floor of this House. No one should make light of the fact that there are some folks on this side who really do believe that fighting joblessness is the greatest way to help America reduce deficits and help put our Nation back to work. That means putting black America back to work, putting Hispanic Americans back to work, putting teenagers back to work, putting all Americans back to work. I endorse the idea that Vernon Jordan said a number of years ago that you cannot put America back to work until you put black America back to work, and we need to go further and say jobs for every one who needs and wants one.

I question honestly and sincerely how the Black Caucus budget is going to put this country back to work by adding another $185 billion of taxes on the backs of the American people and the economy. I would say to my friend from the District of Columbia only people pay taxes; I do not know that they are black or white, but all people pay taxes and sooner or later the burden of heavy taxation falls on the poor and the workers in lost wages or lost jobs.

Mr. GINGRICH pointed out that removing indexing really hurts the 80 percent of the total taxpayers of America who make less than $50,000 a year. Second, I would say to my friends in the Black Caucus, on some things we have worked together, and in some places we have disagreed, but hear me out on this one point, wealthy people of this country, are paying more taxes under Ronald Reagan than under the previous administration. Irrespective of some of the tax breaks that you would like to remove I will join you in removing some of the tax breaks we are now seeing that the way to raise the most revenue from the rich, is to reform the Tax Code. Lower the tax rates on both capital and labor. Take out the loopholes and deductions that obfuscate the tax system and make it unfair, but lower the rates from the bottom to the top.

Now let me say something, because you are listening and I appreciate that. As I said the wealthy are paying higher taxes today because of the rate reduction of 1981 than they were paying under Jimmy Carter or under the previous administration when the rates were higher.

People with income over $1 million, are paying 42 percent higher tax revenues into the Federal Treasury according to the IRS today because the rates were lowered. In effect, we did not do it to help the rich, despite the rhetoric to the contrary; we did it in the sincere belief that if the rates were set closer to an equilibrium level at which people would be encouraged to put their capital into investment, into new jobs or new factories or new investment or savings of some form, the revenue to the Treasury from that investment would be higher than when people invested in tax-free shelters or in loopholes or sat on a yacht offshore or put their money in offshore tax shelters.

With all due respect to our liberal critics the results are now in and people earning over $50,000 in this country are now paying higher taxes into the Federal Treasury, and those earning under $50,000 are paying less in taxes on the income that they earn from wages and salaries and investment. In other words, since the across-the-board tax cuts started coming into effect, the tax burden in this country has shifted up toward the wealthy. This is exactly what the Black Caucus wants to see happen, and we are seeing it happen, thanks to the Reagan tax cuts.

It is not perfect, not by a far cry. But the point that Mr. GINGRICH made is very important, which is, that the tax system should be used to help all people become richer; the tax system should not be used to make the rich poor. The tax system should be used to encourage the poor to get rich; but the assumption, the premise, the root foundation of the Black Caucus tax proposal is to make someone richer you must make someone else poorer.

I do not say this to be disrespectful of the effort that is being made here today; I say it out of a sincere desire to stimulate a dialog over how we can make this whole Nation richer. I do not mean richer in terms of just creature comforts or richer in terms of just material benefits; but richer in terms of opportunity, hope, jobs and entrepreneurship. What is implied in your new Tax Code is that if you earn less than $20,000 that is OK, but do not aspire to earn $21,000 because your taxes will go up. And for sure, do not earn more than $50,000, because then we really are going to get you. Your Tax Code increases the progressivity of the Tax Code. And anything that increases the steep progressivity of the Tax Code in effect, redistributes wealth but it makes the whole economic pie smaller. It means everyone gets less than before. You are not going to get more wealth out of the rich; you are not going to get more wealth transferred to the Federal Government from rich people by increasing the progressivity.

They are going to find shelters; hire more lawyers; hire more accountants, and is that not what has happened over the past 20 years?

President John Kennedy said in 1963, "the major roadblock to a full employment economy is the heavy burden of taxes on the American people." In 1963, President John F. Kennedy set out to change it; and he did. He offered a 25-percent across-the-board reduction in everybody's tax rates for all the American people. He reduced the 91-percent bracket to 70. He cut the capital gains tax rate by 30 percent; he cut the income tax rates of middle income Americans by about 15 percent and he cut the working peoples' tax rates from 20 down to 14 percent. Revenues went up, especially from the rich. I know that times are different, I know parallels in history are seldom perfect but he was not called antipoor; he was called a friend of the poor, and he was.

But the gentleman should not dismiss out-of-hand President Kennedy's idea that was brought back in 1981. The graduated, complex high rate tax system in and of itself in this country is fundamentally geared against the poor and minorities. It is geared against their ever getting any wealth. What we are saying is we have got to make the Tax Code simpler, fairer, more flat, and lower the rates. It is the one way we can give hope and opportunity to those at the lower end of the scale.

Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEMP. I yield to the gentleman from the District of Columbia.

Mr. FAUNTROY. I thank the gentleman from yielding.

I have listened very carefully to the gentleman because I hope that he will reciprocate and read very carefully the Congressional Black Caucus alternative because it does in fact provide the kind——

Mr. KEMP. May I say to my friend that I am one of the few people in this body who has read the budget.

Mr. FAUNTROY. And you are going to vote for it, I hope.

Mr. KEMP. No; I am not going to vote for it, but I want to talk to the gentleman.

Mr. FAUNTROY. May I talk to you now?

Mr. KEMP. OK, let us talk to each other.

Mr. FAUNTROY. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. KEMP. I want to engage the gentleman in a real conversation.

Mr. FAUNTROY. May I respond to the gentleman?

Mr. KEMP. Yes.

Mr. FAUNTROY. I am impressed with your concern about the working poor and middle-income America.

I am less concerned about the million dollar earner.

Mr. KEMP. I know that.

Mr. FAUNTROY. Who has his 49-percent increase when the CBO points out that the average person making $10,000 is $280 short of income now than before.

Mr. KEMP. Well, let us cut their tax rates again.

Mr. FAUNTROY. I thought you said you did not want any rat-a-tat-tat?

Mr. KEMP. Well, I am saying——

Mr. FAUNTROY. Will you allow me to finish my sentence?

Mr. KEMP. Let us cut their tax rates.

Mr. FAUNTROY. When the gentleman is prepared to engage in some dialog, I will be very happy to engage in a colloquy with him.

Mr. KEMP. I am just simply saying we should cut their tax rates.

What is the gentleman's response to that?

Mr. FAUNTROY. If you want to cut tax rates far more for 80 percent of the American people than indexing does now, vote for the Congressional Black Caucus alternative.

Mr. KEMP. I cannot.

Mr. FAUNTROY. Because the fact is that we provide more in tax relief for people earning $40,000 under the Congressional Black Caucus budget than does the present system.

□ 1100

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York (Mr. KEMP) has 2 minutes remaining.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEMP. I thank the gentleman for yielding this additonal time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I would say to my friend that if you are wealthy and you are already in the 50-percent bracket, indexing does not affect your income taxes. It really only affects your income taxes if you earn less than $50,000. It does affects you marginally as you earn, but if you earn $1 million, I would say to my friend from Texas who keeps shaking his head, you are not worried about the first tax dollar you pay; you are worried about the last dollar you pay.

The straw that breaks the camel's back is not the first straw, it is the last straw. The last straw of taxation is the tax dollar that makes you decide not to invest in a widget factory in the District of Columbia or in New York or Buffalo instead it makes you decide to sit on your municipal tax-free bonds. That last tax dollar cost D.C. jobs and lost wages for the unemployed who could have been working if there had been a strong incentive to invest in that factory.

The gentleman wants to cut taxes for people under $20,000 and raise it for people over $20,000, and that hurts the poor because everybody hopes to earn more than $20,000. I can remember when I started out in professional football making $5,000 and I dreamed of making what Bobby Layne made in 1957—$18,000. Then I made $18,000 and I wanted to make $20,000. When I made $20,000, I wanted to make more. That is something to which most people aspire, that is to rise up the ladder of income and opportunity.

The American dream is not to earn just up to $20,000. If you are a black entrepreneur in this country, or white entrepreneur, the Black Caucus' tax plan punishes the very people we want to create the jobs. I would say to my friend something I said yesterday.

Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEMP. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FAUNTROY. I am just a gentleman, and when I am interrupted, I respond.

Mr. KEMP. I said yesterday during the Humphrey-Hawkins debate.

Mr. FAUNTROY. I watched it.

Mr. KEMP. I was saying that you cannot create employees without first creating employers. We have to have people who go out and create those jobs. The gentleman is concerned about jobs, and I share that concern, but why just limit your concern to one segment of the population? Why should we not design a tax system that allows everybody to go out and earn and work and save and consider investment. They will pay more taxes if they are working and investing than if they are not working, and they will pay more taxes if they are investing in widget factories than in shelters. We should not pit labor versus capital or rich versus poor or vice versa.

There are no urban enterprise zones in the Black Caucus budget. What a disappointment it is, Mr. DIXON, that your budget did not even build into your tax policy urban enterprise zones. What a disappointment that you turn your back on one of the most important idea for urban jobs and revitalization in the last 20 years.

Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEMP. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FAUNTROY. Let me again say that I am very impressed with the gentleman's concern about the wealthy people making above $100,000, but if the gentleman is concerned about 80 percent of the American people who make $50,000 or less, then I want the gentleman to explain to them when you vote against the caucus budget why he voted to deny them tax relief this year beyond that which has already been programed and in a fashion that will enable us to deal with the deficit which is keeping interest rates high, which is making it impossible for small business people and for business generally to compete in the world markets, which is forcing the cost of their goods abroad higher, which is forcing, indeed, the export of capital and jobs to cheap labor markets abroad.

Explain that to the American people when you vote against the Congressional Black Caucus alternative budget, which reduces the deficit by some $223 billion over the next 3 years, at the same time that we reclaim $181 billion in tax revenues that went primarily to rich individuals and major corporations.

Mr. KEMP. First of all, my friend from the District of Columbia is in error if he believes the tax cuts have caused the deficit. In 1984 bracket creep alone has reduced the tax cut by over $47 billion. Social security tax increases and a number of other tax hikes Congress passed since 1981 have added another $63 billion back, so by the time you look at everything, the net loss to the 1984 budget is about $22 billion, a very small portion of the deficit we are talking about.

As I pointed out yesterday, the fact is that taxes have continued to take about 19 percent of this country's GNP year after year since the 1970's. The deficit does not come from the tax cuts; it comes from the huge spending increases in the last few year's budgets.

Second of all, I tried to make clear, and I realize the gentleman does not accept this, that I do not think that cutting everyone's tax rates equally is being concerned about just one class taxpayer.

Mr. FAUNTROY. That is why I want to eliminate indexing.

Mr. KEMP. Mr. Chairman, may I have my time back?

My friend is not leaving I hope?

Mr. FAUNTROY. No; I am sitting right here.

Mr. KEMP. We should not divide this country into rich and poor and middle income, or $20,000 and above, or $20,000 and below, and say that above $50,000 is bad and under $50,000 is good, or poor people are going to be poor forever. Let us try to make the poor rich or at least richer.

Your budget, with all due respect, suggests that once you are poor, always poor. I reject that. I reject that. Even GARY HART recognizes that we need a bigger pie, and we do not get a bigger pie by redistributing income. If we want to help the poor, we should be moving toward a flatter, fairer, simpler, lower tax rate system for all. And we will be introducing one such as that designed by BRADLEY and GEPHARDT.

You raised the earned income tax credit by 6 percent. I would raise it high enough, so that the working poor would be removed from the tax rolls. I do not think the working poor should even have to pay income tax. The way to finance that would be to get the tax rates down to where people would actually pay more tax at the lower rate, and that is what has been happening, despite everyone shaking their heads. That has happened. The official preliminary tax figures from the IRS for 1982 show that those who earned $50,000 and above paid $7.3 billion more in 1982 than the year before, while those earning under $50,000 paid less in 1982.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York (Mr. KEMP) has again expired.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEMP. I appreciate the gentleman yielding me this additional time.

Mr. Chairman, this is an emotional issue because we are all wrapped up in what we think will help the most people. But I think we should reject the idea of dividing this country into classes. We can only help the country's poor by making the economy grow, and this CBC budget is not a growth budget it is an austerity budget and I submit, austerity is not the answer, it is the problem. I am going to vote against it not because I disagree with the goal of my friends in CBC, but I am going to vote against it because I disagree with the means to the end. I do not think raising taxes in a recession or in a recovery will create jobs.

I congratulate you all for bringing this to the floor, but I think we really ought to give some thought to tax reform, simplicity, lower rates, and getting interest rates down by more pressure on the Federal Reserve Board, to stop trying to slow down this recovery as they seem bent on doing by raising the Federal funds rate. I think the gentleman would agree with me that we should look forward to a continuing dialog about how to really help poor people in America, because with all due respect to our friends in the Congressional Black Caucus, this budget is not only going to make the poor poorer, this budget is going to make the whole country poor.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New York (Mr. WEISS).

Mr. WEISS. I thank my distinguished friend for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I simply want to commend the Congressional Black Caucus for presenting what I think is the fairest and best conceived budget of all those that have been proposed.

It is easy to talk, but if we really want to cut the deficits back, if we want to cut the waste and extravagance out of military expenditures, if we want to restore the opportunities for jobs and to restore some of the cuts in basic programs which are absolutely essential for America, I urge all of my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to vote for the Black Caucus budget amendment.

Four years ago, Ronald Reagan promised to "chart a different course" for this Nation. Today, there are few who would challenge his success in fulfilling that ominous vow.

The President set out to cut domestic spending, and he has succeeded. By cutting $192 billion from domestic programs through 1985, he has ignored the needs of disadvantaged and working Americans, thrusting 8 million more of them into poverty.

He has set out to increase military spending, and he has succeeded. Defense spending has been increased by $79 billion through 1985, funding more and more armaments that edge us closer and closer to an unthinkable confrontation.

He set out to cut taxes, and he has succeeded. The largest tax cuts in history, expected to exceed $1 trillion by 1989, have succeeded in making the wealthy wealthier while ordinary Americans struggle to get by.

And, in achieving these successes, the President has accumulated more debt than many of us dreamed possible. It is a debt which has raised interest payments more than the amount of "savings" from reduced social spending. And it is a debt which seriously endangers the future of our economy and the ability of our Government to meet the needs of its people.

The chief flaw of most of the budget proposals which we are considering is that they fail to recognize that Ronald Reagan has achieved his objectives. Many of them seek to freeze spending at current levels, which would simply maintain Ronald Reagan's costly and inhumane policies. And many of them seek to cut the rate of increase in defense spending or cut the rate of decrease in domestic spending, which would simply slow the rise in Ronald Reagan's national misery index.

However, there is one budget before us today which recognizes that Ronald Reagan's policies must be turned back, not reinforced. The Congressional Black Caucus has introduced an amendment that will drastically reorder our priorities, raising the value of fairness above greed and heartlessness on our national agenda. The Black Caucus deserves the highest commendation for this proposal, which represents the only real alternative to the continued threat posed by the policies of Ronald Reagan.

The Congressional Black Caucus budget would target employment, education, health care, urban renewal, mass transit, and other domestic needs as our chief priorities. In all, the budget provides $63.9 billion more for domestic programs and $35 billion more for essential entitlement programs over 3 years.

The caucus budget would reject the wasteful excess in military expenditures by eliminating funding for destabilized weapons systems, such as the MX, Trident II, Pershing II, and cruise. In all, defense reductions would total $202.7 billion over 3 years.

And the caucus budget would take a giant leap in the direction of tax equity by instituting overdue reforms that will raise $181 billion in new revenues over the next 3 years.

These important steps will result in deficit reductions of $324 billion by 1987, far greater than those under any other plan.

Mr. Chairman, we have before us a budget that does not only stem the tide, but turns the tide back. It is a budget that serves the needs of all Americans. I call upon all Members who seek a secure and prosperous future for our Nation to join me in support of the Congressional Black Caucus budget.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire as to how much time I have remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will advise the gentleman from California (Mr. DIXON) that he has 45 minutes remaining.

Mr. DIXON. I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Maryland (Mr. MITCHELL).

Mr. MITCHELL. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, the truth of the matter is, the country is already divided into classes. I heard that argument raised. The country is divided into classes, and those divisions are being etched more sharply simply because of the policies that this administration has pursued over the last 3 years.

I must confess that I take this 2 minutes to speak to my disillusionment and, to some degree, my cynicism I am a little weary of this budget process each year when we parrot words and we lay out economic theories and stratagems and we neglect the real problem, the people who are hurt and suffering in this country. Our budget the CBC budget addresses those real problems.

I oppose the other budgets, many of them simply because they impose a freeze. If we impose a freeze, what we are doing is freezing thousands of people into abject misery and poverty where we have forced them over the last 3 years.

Four million Americans have gone back into poverty since this administration took over. If we impose any kind of freeze, we are freezing in 17.2 percent of black Americans who are out of work, desperate, hopeless, almost beyond regaining any sense of human dignity.

I oppose many of the other budgets because of the freeze concept. We are freezing military budgets or we are increasing them, either of the two, and when we do that, we freeze the mentality of young men and women in this country. We freeze their mentality in terms of a militaristic position, a militaristic attitude, which says that the problems of the world will be solved by more bombs and MX missiles.

This budget does not impose that psychological or physical cruelty on our fellow human beings. Talking about an increase in the military budget is almost tragic because the hard fact of the matter is that if we continue the rate of spending as we are now doing, by 1988, we will be spending, in constant dollars, $330 billion a year, more than we spent at the height of the war in Vietnam. In 1969, it was only about $268 billion; now we are talking about $330 billion for killing, for weapons of death and destruction.

Mr. Chairman, I am glad to speak on behalf of the alternative budget. Overall unemployment continues to cripple our economy. The unacceptable levels among certain segments of our society—minorities, blacks, and youth, wreak particular havoc on our hopes for economic recovery.

It is particularly disheartening to know that, for the most part, we continue to accept certain levels of unemployment as a fact of life. This sad commentary is rooted in the philosophical tradeoff which clings to the contention that unemployment is inevitable to fight high inflation.

Philosophical security blankets notwithstanding, we avoid the harsh realities of unemployment, underemployment, and the plight of those uncounted among the statistics: those who have become so frustrated that they are not even seeking anymore.

We rejoice in slight increases in housing starts, or a prosperous day on Wall Street, and insist that we are one step closer to a recovery nationwide. Such economic indicators, however, do not extend to include those families whose households have been ripped apart because those who seek jobs are unable to find them, or untrained such that opportunities cannot offer much hope.

The response to our families' crises cannot continue to be the stripping away of job-training initiatives. Nor can it be an overabundance of defense spending in the face of continuous tax cuts and breaks. The response must be an equitable budget package which embraces the concept that employment must be a priority.

Once again, we have a chance to provide a sound budget package. Today, we continue deliberation of the fiscal year 1985 first concurrent budget resolution. Let us insure that our budget priorities will reflect a commitment to those programs which constitute an investment in our families. The provision of employment opportunities nationwide, and training and retraining initiatives where needed, are indeed the most important and fundamental steps to insuring the stability of our families. Let us not fail them lest we weaken the foundation for all of our other efforts.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS).

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, my responsibility is to discuss the defense function of the fiscal year 1985 military budget. Five minutes certainly does not provide this gentleman adequate opportunity to engage in a discussion of a budget in the nature of $313 billion submitted by this administration to the Congress of the United States.

To preface my remarks, I would like to point out, Mr. Chairman, that the various program functions are discussed and debated on this floor in three forms: During the budget process where we discuss priorities, during the authorization process where we discuss specific programs, and during the appropriation process where we discuss moneys. But the interesting thing about all three of these debates is that while there are some significant differences in the thrust of the discussions, there is an enormous preoccupation on this floor with numbers. Do the numbers look right? Do the numbers sound right?

We have in many ways reduced ourselves to auctioneers when we discuss such concepts as real growth, 10 percent, 2 percent, 5.7 percent, et cetera. We have an enormous preoccupation with total numbers and with percentages.

Nowhere is this more graphically illustrated than when we discuss the military function, because here we are concerned with the overall figure and here we are concerned with the concepts of real growth.

Mr. Chairman, in the estimation of those of us who are the members of the Congressional Black Caucus, this is a seriously flawed approach, particularly as we discuss the issue of military defense. This budget function, as we perceive it, must be analyzed in terms of our foreign and military policy objectives. We should spend what is adequate in our view to maintain our national security interests, but the Congressional Black Caucus strongly disagrees with the administration's assessment of what is indeed necessary to maintain our national security. We believe that the national security role of this Nation as perhaps the preeminent superpower on this planet should be to assert ourselves dramatically to the course of peace.

Military tensions, Mr. Chairman, must be eased. Détente must be revived. The threat of thermonuclear war must be reduced and ultimately removed.

There are five major themes that are the underpinnings of this budget submitted by the Congressional Black Caucus with respect to the defense function: First, to lessen the threat of thermonuclear war; second, to move us away from an interventionist militaristic foreign policy; third, a reduced U.S. military role in Europe and in Asia; fourth, a redirection of procurement policies to reduce waste, fraud, abuse, and excessive cost overruns; and, finally, Mr. Chairman, a stronger national security through a policy of conversion to an economy which is less dependent upon the military function and military expenditures.

To proceed in this direction would result in a reduction in the budget deficit in outlays over fiscal year 1985 through 1987, of $208 billion, and with respect to budget authority, $318 billion.

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman to just let me finish my last comment first.

In summary, Mr. Chairman, what we need is a policy based on the defense of U.S. interests, not the pursuit of thermonuclear war, not the pursuit of an interventionist foreign policy. To proceed in this direction would require greatly reduced levels of military expenditures, create fewer distortions in our overall economy, and significantly enhance the prospects for peace and real arms reduction.

In my closing remarks, Mr. Chairman, I would like to focus on those Members of this body who would like to support the Congressional Black Caucus alternative but who say that maybe the military function numbers are incorrect. Let us understand this: If we take 1983 as the base, if we leave out the Department of Energy, we are talking about an increase each year of slightly less than 5 percent real growth.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS) has expired.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS).

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I thank my colleague for yielding extra time to me. I will make this last comment, and then I will yield to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. WEBER).

That was 1983. If we take 1980 as a base, we have increased the American military budget each year by approximately 9 percent real growth, or, perhaps more currently, 8.8 percent real growth each year. This is an extraordinary increase. So even with this military budget that has some substantial cuts, we are still talking about a military budget of $243 billion.

This gentleman has extreme difficulty with that. But I am not going to get caught up in the illusion of the numbers. What we have to do is analyze these numbers in the context of policy and in the context of prior mistakes. What we want to do is move us away from the incredibly escalating military budget that has occurred in the context of the Reagan administration.

Mr. Chairman, I now yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Minnesota. (Mr. WEBER).

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I commend him on his presentation. I do not share the gentleman's philosophical perspective, but this mastery of this subject, I think, is admired by all of us.

I do not claim to be any kind of an expert on military affairs, and I have a couple of questions that go to the gentleman's presentation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS) has expired.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I would ask if the Members on that side would give us a couple of minutes of their time. We are tied up very tightly on this side.

Ms. FIEDLER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS).

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, first of all, the gentleman talked about lessening the threat of nuclear war and about reducing the American role in Europe.

As I understand it, some people, including a number of defense analysts, have proposed that we could lessen the threat of nuclear war in Europe precisely by spending more in Europe on conventional armament, and I would like the gentleman to address that question.

How can we both reduce the threat of thermonuclear war in Europe and maintain the defense of Europe without spending more money?

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, first, let me give the gentleman two responses.

First of all, by increasing our conventional capability in Europe, all we do is escalate the level of the military budget because it is precisely in the area of personnel that extraordinary expenditures are taking place. So if we move from nuclear to conventional and escalate our numbers, we escalate the military budget, and in my estimation there is a disastrous impact on the budget deficits, particularly in the out years.

Second, when we look at the threat, the conventional threat between the United States and the Soviet Union on a scale from 1 to 10 it is somewhere between zero and 1, but if we engage in a confrontation with the Soviet Union, we must understand that there is no such thing at this point as a purely conventional force. All of our forces are nuclearly equipped, both in the United States and the Soviet Union. If we ever engage in conflict with the Soviet Union, within a relatively short period of time, we would be escalating from conventional to tactical, and within a matter of a couple or 3 weeks we would be in global strategic nuclear war engulfing the entire world in the insanity of thermonuclear war.

So I think we are kidding ourselves in talking about moving from nuclear to a conventional buildup, No. 1, as I said, because of the impact on the budget, and No. 2, it is an illusion. If we go to war with the Soviet Union, we are not talking about a protracted conventional land war; we are talking about escalation to a thermonuclear war which would result in megadeaths of human beings beyond our mental capacity to comprehend.

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. DELLUMS. I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Chairman, my second question has to do with the gentleman's comment about waste and fraud and abuse in the Pentagon's budget. Presumably most of us agree with that, and I have struggled as much as I can to try to identify some genuine military reforms that would not get caught up in this ideological debate that we have.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS) has expired once again.

Ms. FIEDLER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS).

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. DELLUMS. I am happy to yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Chairman, my question is, Has the Congressional Black Caucus identified in terms of an attack on waste, fraud, and abuse, some specific areas that would not get caught up in the ideological debates over military strategy, or can we genuinely reform the military budget and obtain some money that way?

Mr. DELLUMS. First of all, as the gentleman knows, we are going forward with this debate on how we handle this incredible scandal of spare parts. There are a number of us, both in the Congressional Black Caucus and out of the Black Caucus, who have offered very specific approaches as to how to get a handle on not paying $10,000 for a wrench that might cost $0.50; so that is No. 1, and that is not ideological. You can be a rightwing reactionary and still want to save American taxpayers from that kind of absurd expenditure.

No. 2, I think that we have to begin to look at our procurement procedures in terms of the amount of time that we use to purchase equipment; for example, the gentleman might be interested in knowing that one place where I agree with the Secretary of Defense, he pointed out that the way we cut the budget costs American taxpayers more money over the long haul because we never really stop a weapons system in this Congress. All we do is stretch out the buying. That eventually costs people an extraordinary amount of money. To condense that is to save people money.

I thank the gentleman for his courtesy.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 seconds to the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. BONIOR).

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Dixon amendment. The amendment we have before us now more closely mirrors my values and I believe the values of the district that I represent.

I think if you were to present to the people of this country the numbers that have been laid out here in terms of the deficit, in terms of tax equity, in terms of domestic programs and in terms of needs to cut defense, and took away all the labels, conservative caucus, Black Caucus, or freeze, and had them pick, I think you would be very surprised at the number of people in this country that would identify themselves and associate themselves with this particular program.

I would like to suggest to my colleagues that my constituents in 1972, voted 65 percent for George Wallace. I have maybe 1½ percent black population, but I think this resolution fits very closely with the needs of the people I represent. While I might not agree with all the revenue assumptions in the amendment, I believe they take a great step toward fiscal responsibility.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. CONYERS).

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Chairman, I am very proud to take part in this debate today on the congressional Black Caucus fiscal year 1985 budget proposal. As a number of speakers already have indicated, the caucus budget is the only far-reaching reform proposal under consideration this year by the House. This fourth annual CBC alternative budget also happens to be the boldest new blueprint for the Nation that the caucus ever has proposed.

Yesterday I took the liberty of sending copies of the caucus budget proposal to the three Democratic Presidential candidates. I would have been remiss if I had failed to attempt to project the superb caucus blueprint into the national Presidential debate that is occurring. After all, there is no greater audience than the audience in a Presidental election year. The caucus budget should be reviewed by every thoughtful citizen. I might add, at this very moment, the caucus budget is under review by the candidates. Jesse Jackson already has expressed a keen interest in the priorities that the caucus budget raises.

Jobs and economic justice are at the core of my remarks this morning. More of my colleagues in the House have to speak to the unemployment crisis that millions of individuals are experiencing and that is ruining large areas of the Nation. Not many, except for the supporters of the caucus budget, are proposing solutions.

Yesterday I listened to the remarks of my distinguished colleague from New York (Mr. JACK KEMP) and I heard him extol the virtues of the administration's supply-side economic policy. I heard him say, "this is the strongest recovery in a noninflationary environment since the early 1960s." Then how does my colleague explain the fact that in Buffalo, N.Y., which he represents in Congress, the annualized average jobless rate during all of 1983 was 16.3 percent. The rate of Detroit, the city I represent, was 18.7 percent, one of the highest jobless rates in the Nation, and not much more than Buffalo's rate.

Supply-side economics—the policy of the Reagan administration—simply has not worked. Central to supply-side economics is the notion that tax cuts will encourage personal savings and increased investment. It has done neither. The rate of personal savings is lower today than it was a decade ago after the 1974-75 recession. Personal savings continue to decline. Business investment is no higher today than it was in 1980. Federal deficits have quadrupled in the past 3 years. According to a recent CBO study, a major cause of the deficit is the 1981 tax cut, in which the Government lost $4 for every dollar that it gained through domestic program cuts. It already is crystal clear that the supply-side program has favored the wealthy while penalizing the lower and middle income groups.

Nobody in the administration has dared to tackle the structural, long-term unemployment that has plagued minority groups and the young. Except for the Congressional Black Caucus budget proposal, none of the other seven budget proposals before us has any inkling of the threat to our society that unemployment poses. None has even the slightest idea of how to solve the hard-core unemployment problem.

The caucus budget proposal is the only one that boldly challenges existing Federal priorities—the enormous mismatch between programs and needs, between military spending, on the one hand, and human resources, on the other. The CBC alternative budget would cut military spending by $78.5 billion in budget authority next year alone. At the same time, it calls for a massive peacetime conversion employment program for workers who might lose their jobs as a result of reductions in weapon development. The defense budget in my mind is the single greatest obstacle in the Federal system that is blocking both economic revitalization and the fulfillment of human needs.

The caucus budget also is the only proposal that implements the principles of a nuclear freeze by halting the funds for the further development, testing and production of new nuclear warheads and delivery systems. Existing stockpiles would be maintained to give both superpowers the time to negotiate a mutual freeze.

The caucus budget fundamentally reverses the priorities of the Reagan administration by cutting military spending, restoring and expanding domestic programs, raising nearly $200 billion in additional revenues over 3 years as a result of far-reaching tax reform, and building over the same time major new educational, training and job development programs.

I am proud of the CBC budget proposal. In fact, it does the impossible, which alone should be reason for half of my colleagues to support it. Of all the budget proposals before the House, it goes furthest in trimming the Federal deficit in each of the next 3 years. At the same time this carefully crafted and fiscally sound plan really offers the only coherent reform alternative to the Reagan administration's inequities at home and belligerence abroad approach.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 seconds to the gentlewoman from Ohio (Ms. OAKAR).

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, I am rising to support the Black Caucus substitute, proposed by the distinguished gentleman from California (Mr. DIXON), and to register a strong protest against problems I see in the other budget proposals.

Mr. Chairman, the Black Caucus proposal is the only one that does not cut medicare spending. This budget is a welcome change from the budgets we have passed lately. Since 1981, we have slashed medicare by more than $13 billion. Of those cuts, almost $3 billion represented direct out-of-pocket costs for elderly and disabled beneficiaries. These people cannot afford any more cuts. For the one in seven senior citizens living in poverty, every dollar in higher medical costs means 1 less dollar for food or heat. The same holds true for older women—two-thirds of all senior citizens—whose average monthly income is only $390. We simply cannot, in good conscience, ask the elderly to strain their already limited income to pay more for medical care.

Of course, it is true that several of the budget proposals claim that their $4 billion medicare cuts will be achieved only through cost-containment measures and will not hurt beneficiaries. It is also true, however, that the Senate Finance Committee has called for over $9 billion in medicare cuts—cuts that will fall cruelly on beneficiaries. Knowing that, if the House starts with $4 billion in medicare cuts, we are placing seniors at risk. We cannot be sure what will happen in conference negotiations. Indeed, it is very possible that the House-Senate compromise will end up including at least some cuts that hurt the elderly. Mr. Chairman, senior citizens cannot survive another compromise. If we take anything more away from them, some poor people simply are not going to make it.

The budgets that propose medicare cuts raise another important issue. They intend to achieve medicare savings by imposing cost-containment rules on the program and its providers. While I agree with the principle of health cost containment, I do not think it is fair or effective to concentrate our efforts on medicare or medicaid, alone. When we do that, we are in danger of creating a two-tiered health system where those in the Federal programs have less access to and lower quality of care. If we want to control medical costs, we should instead work for nationwide reforms, and not pick on the poor, the disabled, and the elderly—a small portion of all health consumers—who are the most vulnerable.

There is one final problem related to Federal health programs that I want to address, and that is the problem of cuts in medicaid. Thankfully, we have already defeated the budgets that propose medicaid cuts, and I hope this House will continue to defend this vital health program. Cuts in medicaid and other low-income programs since 1981 have been devastating for the poor. Because of these cuts, the number of poor children eligible for medicaid has dropped from 62 percent in 1981 to only 53 percent in 1982. In my own State of Ohio, we have already lost over $1 billion in Federal medicaid funds. We must not lose any more.

The Republicans have proposed reducing Federal medicaid payments to States by 3 percent—a reduction that will cost all States $1.2 billion and my State $37 million. Ohio is still struggling to recover from the Reagan recession. Although our economy is improving, we do not have the funds to replace the lost Federal dollars. If Congress makes more medicaid cuts, Ohio and other States are going to have to make some unpleasant choices about health care for the poor, the aged, and the disabled.

Mr. Chairman, I would also like to commend Mr. DIXON for those portions of his substitute resolution concerning Federal workers and annuitants.

I am pleased that the resolution does not seek to delay the next cost-of-living adjustment for civil service annuitants or reduce the adjustment by one-half for those under age 62. It is grossly unfair to further penalize our senior citizens by cutting back on their annuity benefits. In my opinion, the Civil Service Retirement System has suffered too many benefit reductions in the past few years; we need not add to the burdens that these people already face.

I am very concerned with a proposal in a number of the resolutions to only provide one-half the COLA to Federal retirees under age 62. I do not support placing age restrictions on COLA adjustments; however, if the deficit that our Nation now faces requires this type of action, which I cannot concede it does, then, at a minimum, the restriction should be temporary and not permanent.

I also commend the gentleman for providing Federal workers with a pay raise of 5.5 percent in October. As he knows, the Government is now losing many talented and dedicated employees to the private sector because of the tremendous disparity between their wages and those in private industry. Federal pay now lags more than 20 percent behind the private sector causing a severe hardship on many workers and their families. In my opinion, the absolute minimum pay raise that these employees should receive in October is 5.5 percent. While this will not fully compensate them, it will certainly be positively received and, hopefully, will encourage some very fine and experienced workers to remain with the Federal Government so that our Government can continue to benefit from their experience and expertise.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. OWENS).

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Chairman, at the outset, let me say that the only real alternative to the Reagan budget is the Congressional Black Caucus budget. This is the only budget which is not a clone or a surgical adjustment of the Reagan budget. It is the only budget which does not accept the assumption that what happened in 1981 was good and, therefore, we should only make adjustments to it.

This is the only budget that does not freeze and institutionalize the unfairness of the 1981 Reagan budget.

Reaganomics has failed. Nobody wants to admit it, but Reaganomics has failed. We have the twin disease of high unemployment at the same time we have astronomically high deficits. We have never had that kind of phenomenon before. It is like a patient having a fever and chills at the same time. It is a frightening and dangerous phenomenon and some steps should be taken to cure it.

The simple matter of providing more jobs in order to put money in the pockets of consumers who would then put money back into the economy, who would then pay higher payroll taxes; that simple remedy seems not to merit much discussion around here, but it is the remedy that we need.

The simple remedy, however, also of taxing corporations, making corporations pay a higher part of the tax burden—now they are down to 8 percent of the tax burden. If corporations paid more of the tax burden, you would have the money to finance some of the things that need to be done.

This Congressional Black Caucus has $8 billion for an increase in job training funds. It also has $3.5 billion in there for the Community Renewal Act, which has already been passed by the House of Representatives.

We add also $2 billion for youth employment. All these things are very badly needed. Youth unemployment is now in the black communities across the country hovering around 50 percent, 50 percent youth black unemployment. Something must be done.

The overall employment situation would be helped best by the Community Renewal Act, which has already been passed.

I think when all is said and done in this budget-making process, when all these alternatives are considered, the least the Democratic Party can do, the least the Democrats in the House can do is go to the public, go to the American people with a budget which includes in it a remedy for unemployment, a beginning. We cannot cure the whole economy, but we can recognize that there is a sickness, there is a special need out there. Large numbers of people are unemployed, 8 million, and we should address ourselves to that special need while other things are being done to adjust this economy. That special need can best be met by supporting the Community Renewal Act.

When all compromises are over, I think the least we should do is find the money. I think the money is there if we have a greater tax on corporations, a minimum corporation tax of some kind to pay for the $3.5 billion needed to fund the Community Renewal Act. Now, $3.5 billion is the cost of one aircraft carrier. That $3.5 billion when put in the Community Renewal Act would put 500,000 people to work.

We should go to the public with a Democratic Party position which has no less than this $3.5 billion for the Community Renewal Act.

This Congressional Black Caucus budget should be strongly advocated by many more Members of the Congress than the 21 Members who happen to be black. It should be noted that there are more than 50 white Members of the Congress who represent a substantial black population. Among these are four districts in Alabama; three districts in Florida; five districts in Georgia; six districts in Louisiana; four districts in Mississippi; five districts in South Carolina; three districts in Texas; and five districts in Virginia. Special note must be given to the fact that the sponsor of the conservative budget, the gentleman from the Fourth District in Louisiana, represents a district which has a 31 percent black population.

It should also be noted that in more than 50 districts which do not have black Congressmen there is a substantial portion of the population which lives in poverty. This Congressional Black Caucus budget is a budget which advocates programs and expenditures for all poor people throughout America. It is also probably no surprise that where there is high poverty, an overwhelming percentage of those who are poor are also black. If the Congressmen in this House would begin to truly represent their constituencies there would be enough votes to pass the CBC budget.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. GONZALEZ).

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this approach. This very wonderful work being done here is the only realistic attempt to represent the greatest interest of the greatest number.

The Dixon substitute starts where all budgets should begin: With the consideration of how we can deal in a humane and realistic way with the most pressing and desperate of this country's social and economic problems. It starts with the idea of justice and decency. It starts with the idea that we can serve all the legitimate needs of this country, if we but spread the burden a little more fairly.

There is no question, for example, about the gross inequity of the tax system as it exists today. Nor is there any doubt that the Reagan tax bill of 1981 added grotesque new breaks for those already well off, even as it penalized those who earned ordinary incomes. The Dixon substitute would undo some of the more egregious injustices of that tax bill, would start us on the way to rebuilding the Federal Government's shattered tax base, and would at least make a beginning toward creating a fair sharing of the burden for providing this Nation's basic and inescapable needs.

Other substitutes offer shades and gradations that range from the ridiculous, which is the President's dead-on-arrival official budget, to the unconscionable, which is the minority substitute. In between those extremes lie choices that offer bits and shards of conscience and economic reality, and great chunks of political gamesmanship. But the Dixon substitute is the only one that makes a real stab at providing for the most urgent needs we have and establishing a beginning toward restoring sound economic growth and economic justice.

I have no illusions. I know that such a radical idea as decency and justice stands little chance in the big-money world of today's politics. But there are those of us who still stand on principles, and in principle, the Dixon language offers the best choice of all the alternatives we have been presented.

I have no illusion that anything we pass here today will be translated into meaningful policy. It was clear to me 2 years ago, and I said so at the time, that the Nation is caught in an economic policy gridlock. The President denies any responsibility for the deficit he has produced, refuses to recognize any need for any form of tax reform, no matter how gross the inequities are, or how obvious the economic and fiscal need is; denies even the analytical studies on his tax program done by the Congressional Budget Office that is, ironically, headed by one of his own party. And I might add that when it comes to budget data, only the Congressional Budget Office has any genuine credibility in any respectable place in Washington—its numbers are at least honest, insofar as budget numbers can ever be honest. He denies the economic forecasts of his own chief economic adviser. He denies any need to do anything, and when he at last is pushed by his own party into a deficit reduction package, produces another Stockman comedy of smoke and mirrors, garnished by yet another slash at the poor, the elderly, the young, and the ill. Meanwhile, the Congress cannot act. The Senate will not pass what the House recommends, because of partisan concerns; the House lacks the will to produce any meaningful distinction between its program and that of the administration; and neither possesses the integrity to override the President's intransigence. The result is gridlock.

That gridlock produces an unending picture of vast deficits, deficits that eat up two-thirds of all the domestic savings that this country can produce. It is a gridlock that keeps interest rates at an alltime high, in so-called real terms. It is a gridlock that places all the burden of economic stabilization on the feeble hands and minds of the Federal Reserve. It is a gridlock that places all the economic burden on the shoulders of the working people of this country, who continue to suffer from immense unemployment, who are unable to improve their earning power and who are unable to look forward to a better life. It is a gridlock that deepens and accelerates the boom and bust cycle of housing. It is a gridlock that continues to reduce the level of homeownership in this country. It is a gridlock that keeps bankruptcy on the rise, and that continues to weaken the competitive strength of every single basic American industry. It is a gridlock that continues to expand the number of poor people, and that deepens the wounds and sorrows of those who are already poor. It is a gridlock that inspires fear and concern and unease throughout the country, for every citizen high or low. It is a gridlock that freezes us into inaction when it comes to addressing the urgent needs of the homeless, of the hungry, of those who are about to lose their homes or farms, or who are facing the fears and terrors of major physical or mental health problems.

We have made the error of pretending—as I have said on many previous occasions—that there was some magic in the budget resolution. There is no way that any one of us, not even the most serious and studious member of the Budget Committee itself, could understand and grasp the implications of all the resolutions that are spread before us. There is no way that any Member of this House can even guess at what assumptions go into these various resolutions, with respect to specific programs that might interest or concern us. We are faced with an array of policy guesses, because we only know in a very general way the policy directions that these various resolutions include and assume. There is no way that we can, in the space of a few short hours, digest and understand the specific implications of these budget alternatives, all of which involve weeks and months of detailed study by experts of one stripe or another, all aided by huge amounts of computer time. We can only guess at what these various alternatives actually mean. There is no magic in that.

Neither is there any magic in the forecasts upon which all this fantastic exercise depends. We know that economic forecasts in the past few years have been vastly off base. We can only hope that the forecasts on which all these alternatives rely are more or less accurate, but we know for a fact that they can be thrown off immensely by elements far beyond our control—the flow of foreign investment, for instance. If that one factor changes, the whole interest rate situation will be radically altered—and with it the direction of the economy and any validity that the budget resolution might ever have had.

The budget process was developed at a time when it was assumed the economy would be operating in a stable way. That, of course, is not the case—not since the oil shocks, not since the advent of hyperinterest, not since the debt bomb. Yet we pretend that none of this economic revolution has taken place. We go right on with this process that assumes we know all, understand all, and can control all, and that further assumes changes in policy direction will be gentle, taken in a spirit of concensus, not subjected to howling, radical partisan pressures. The budget process assumes rationality, but the process is, and has been for the past 3 years, anything but rational, anything but reasonable.

The budget process is worst of all a process that denies us the ability to decide issues on their own merit. It allocates a certain amount for housing, and in so doing denies us the opportunity to even discuss housing policy on its own merit. Instead we must fit housing into a Procrustean bed—chopping off arms and legs, to fit the budget box, notwithstanding known needs and requirements, notwithstanding the merit of the program, and notwithstanding the needs that exist in the country, and notwithstanding established, reasonable, and rational goals. It is the same with every other program. No matter how great the need, the budget resolutions will assume only an arbitrary percentage of growth, adjusted for inflation. There is no way that this leaves room for badly needed growth of programs that are absolutely essential and desired and supported by the people of this country. The process, in that sense, robs us of the ability to function as legislators—to make responsible decisions based on evidence and merit. It denies us the ability to examine questions except in terms of arbitrary allocations. This is not the context that even the President uses in developing his programmatic ideas. His budget office examines issue by issue, but the Congress does not. We deny ourselves that option, because the budget process does not permit it. We are handed large boxes of unknowns and told to choose between them. Insofar as being able to obtain just and decent legislation goes, this makes it impossible to act. It locks us into the momentum of the past year and the year before that, and the year before that. It is a process that strips Congress of its most basic, constitutional function, its most vital responsibility—the task of legislating basic policy, legislating on the basis of need and merit. It destroys Congress as an institution coequal with the Executive. And that is the greatest tragedy of all.

The budget process has not even guaranteed sound budgeting. Instead, by laying itself open to the blatant partisanship we saw in 1981, and which was developing even before that, it created a political blind auction. The budget problems have gotten worse since the imposition of the budget process—and the problems show absolutely no sign of improving. Why? Because we do not consider merit in this process, only shades of political interest. There is no sense of national interest in this or any past budget debate since 1981—only raw partisanship.

We are operating today in a budget process that has no economic validity, because the economic realities are fundamentally different from anything that the budget process authors ever imagined would happen. It is invalid because it cannot escape the poisoned wells of partisanship. It is legislatively invalid because it does not permit us to legislate in a sensible and responsible manner—that is, on the merits of given issues. It is invalid as a fiscal tool because it is not worked as a fiscal tool, owing to the political auctions that take place in the name of winning the budget game.

The Dixon substitute at least offers a sense of decency and hope. It at least speaks to principle. But I have no illusions: Whatever we do here today will not undo the policy gridlock, it will not restore any sense of direction to the country, and it will not alter the frustrations of these last 3 years. It will not, because the budget process is fatally flawed by the rule or ruin mentality that has pervaded it from the very beginning of its operation. We would do better to ignore the whole thing, and return ourselves to a world in which we actually take up each budget issue on its own merit. That proved to be a far sounder fiscal approach, a far saner political approach, and a far more rational and responsible legislative approach. It was better than the pseuedo-science that we see here in these various claims and counterclaims, the various so-called alternatives—hardly any of which can be distinguished from the election platform of this or that faction.

This whole exercise is a tragedy and an abomination. It might be partially salvaged by adoption of a principled statement like the Dixon substitute—but I fear that it will not. The process is too flawed, and it too fatally and thoroughly destroys the legislative function for the budget process to be anything but a ruinous, consuming political passion that speaks not to the needs of the Nation, but lays down the legislative birthright, body and soul to the name of a mindless process.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. HAYES).

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the Dixon budget alternative offered on behalf of the Congressional Black Caucus. While there are many positive aspects of the Dixon substitute which are noteworthy, I would like to draw particular attention to the employment and training function of the proposal.

We have all seen the disastrous results of the ill-conceived and misguided economic policies of the Reagan administration. My predecessor, and your former colleague, now the mayor of the city of Chicago, Harold Washington, stood on this very floor and warned that the Reagan economic policies would be disastrous. We know now that his prediction came true. Today we have over 8.8 million Americans out of work with very few prospects of returning to any full-time employment.

Some of the Members of this body who defend the Reagan policies prefer to say we have an unemployment rate of 7.8 percent and declining. I am not talking about percentages, I am talking about real flesh and blood human beings, 8.8 million of them, looking for a chance to make a decent wage and live the American dream. There are thousands more who have been out of work for so long that they are no longer counted in the unemployment statistics. They are considered "discouraged" and occupy a category all their own. In my district alone, the First Congressional District of Illinois, there are over 160,000 people out of work, many of whom have exhausted their unemployment benefits and have no one to turn to for help.

The Dixon substitute sets as a priority for fiscal year 1985, the creation of new job opportunities for the unemployed. The employment and training function of the substitute provides a total of $13.6 billion in budget authority and $12.2 billion in outlays for fiscal year 1985. The administration's fiscal year 1985 budget creates no additional jobs for those who desire to go back to work. This House passed a Job Training Partnership Act with the intent to put Americans back to work. While the administration proposal ignores this intent, the Dixon substitute fully funds those programs authorized by the Job Training Partnership Act.

In September 1983, this body also passed H.R. 1036, the Community Renewal Employment Act, to not only put Americans back to work but also to help rebuild their decaying communities. Unfortunately, more than 8.8 million people are still waiting for that legislation to be enacted so that some of them can go back to work. Their communities are not waiting, they are continuing to fall apart. The Dixon substitute addresses that need by providing $3.5 billion to fund programs under this act. This level of funding would provide for nearly 400,000 new jobs, while at the same time fill unmet needs in many communities around this Nation.

Our unemployment crisis has not only affected the adult population, it has had a very devastating effect on the youth of our Nation. According to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, the current overall rate of youth unemployment is 19.3 percent; 16.5 percent for white youth and an overwhelming 43.4 percent for black youth. The Dixon substitute recognizes that problem by providing $2 billion to fund a new youth training and employment program.

Mr. Chairman, putting people back to work is but one small highlight of the Dixon substitute. However, if the Members of this body are truly serious about economic recovery, about providing economic revitalization, serious about addressing the longstanding social and economic ills of our Nation, if they are serious about providing the commitment, determination and leadership which is necessary to put our country back on the road to prosperity, then I suggest to them that supporting the Dixon substitute is the action they should take.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from New York (Mr. OTTINGER).

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strongest support of the Congressional Black Caucus budget.

It is one of my real regrets in retiring from this body that this is the last time I will have the opportunity as a Member to support the caucus fine work. Consistently the caucus has offered to the House the most thorough, thoughtful and constructive budget alternatives. My congratulations to the caucus and its superb staff for giving us this opportunity.

Support the Congressional Black Caucus budget is particularly important this year because it is the only budget alternative presented which represents a real break with Reagan policies. All the other budgets accept the Reagan premise of gigantic military expenditures and drastic cuts in the domestic investments necessary to make our economy, our country and our security strong. All the other alternatives merely slow down the rate of growth in implementing Reagan's ultraconservative program.

Only the Congressional Black Caucus budget proposes cutting back on the irrational, wasteful, dangerous military buildup on which Reagan has embarked our country. The other budgets provide less than Reagan's requests in various degrees or, at best, a freeze at present levels—but present levels subsume acceptance of the staggering $1.4 trillion military buildup in which we are presently engaged; they thus continue the draining of resources from the areas of real need to assure a strong defense into weapons systems and militaristic postures that are so terribly dangerous, wasteful, and counterproductive. The caucus budget, in a careful and discriminating way, at last would start us on the course of reducing this horrendous military buildup and militaristic approach to the world.

Only the Congressional Black Caucus budget proposes the investments we need in job training and creation, infrastructure, transportation, health and education necessary to make our country strong and competitive. All the other budgets accept the Reagan premises of the need to cut back on vital domestic investments in various degrees. None of the other budgets addresses the question of how we can maintain a strong society or a strong defense without a healthy population equipped to meet the challenges of future technological development, with declining industries transferring daily to foreign shores, with fewer educated youngsters, fewer engineers, scientists and humanities graduates than Russia or our competitor allies graduate each year, with deteriorating cities, collapsing transportation systems and collosal waste of our human resources represented by massive unemployment.

None of the other budgets proposes significant restoration of our tax base. The $200 billion deficts we face consist of $135 billion per year of the tax erosion from the 1981 Reagan tax cuts as their most significant element—yet no other budget does more than scratch the surface of this travesty. The committee budget calls for tax restoration of a mere $17 billion per year. To significantly reduce deficts, it is essential to restore taxes on individuals and corporations that profit from our economy—and only the Congressional Black Caucus budget does this.

In sum, none of the other budgets represent real change from Reaganomics, yet it is clear to me that that is what the country needs—that is what we Democrats should be all about—stopping Reagan's ballooning militarism, restoring an adequate and equitable tax base, and making the investments domestically that are needed to assure a strong Nation. The Congressional Black Caucus budget uniquely does this, and does so in the most economically sound way, reducing the deficit more than any of the other budget alternatives, by a very substantial $324 billion over the next 3 years, almost twice the deficit reduction of the committee proposal.

I strongly urge all of my colleagues to support the Congressional Black Caucus budget alternative.

Ms. FIEDLER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. WEBER).

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the Congressional Black Caucus budget. We have talked about a number of problems I have with it but I would like to take a couple of minutes to address the specific problem that exists in that budget that would affect my district where I think even most members of the Congressional Black Caucus should understand that they really are on the wrong side of the issue.

I am talking about the proposal to roll back the estate tax exemptions to the 1981 and pre-1981 levels. I come from a district in Minnesota that has the lowest median income of any congressional district in Minnesota where we have over 21,000 farmers in my district.

I will tell you, rolling back the estate tax laws to that time does not impact on the Rockefellers of the world and the Du Ponts and the Fords. It impacts on the small farmers and small businessmen in my congressional district and other congressional districts in Iowa, South Dakota, and North Dakota.

The problem is not that these are excessively wealthy people who are simply avoiding taxation because of some loophole they got in the tax bill in 1981. The problem is between 1965 and roughly 1980 the value of the land of the people in my congressional district in some cases tripled or even quadrupled.

So if you take a farm of 320 acres, which may sound like a lot of land to somebody in the city but it is not an exceptionally large farm in my district, that 320-acre farm maybe was valued at $500 an acre in 1965 and was worth about $160,000, so when the farmer died he did not have any big estate tax problems.

Now that farm is probably worth conservatively $1,500 an acre because of land inflation and so that estate is worth, just land now, $480,000. The estate tax exemption was raised and is being raised to protect that family farm.

The problem is what happens if you impose a stiff estate tax penalty on the small business or the small farmer, you do not break up that farm or estate or make it available to smaller farmers. The heir, in most cases the widow, is forced to sell the farm not to a smaller farmer but to a bigger farmer. And the same thing happens in the case of small business people.

So by rolling back that reform that we enacted in the estate tax law, at least in the area of agriculture and small business, which is the backbone of my congressional district, you are achieving precisely the opposite of what I understand to be the intent, the philosophical direction of the Congressional Black Caucus budget.

You will be harming small business people, you will be harming small farmers, and you will be encouraging further concentrations of wealth in agriculture and small business by forcing those marginal people to sell out to bigger operators, which I do not think is the intent of the Congressional Black Caucus.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBER. I will be glad to yield to my colleague.

Mr. GRAY. Certainly you have mentioned a major concern that farmers are facing, particularly the smaller farmers across this Nation.

But I am just wondering whether or not the particular issue you are mentioning, the estate tax, has any relevance to the tremendous number of small farmers who have been forced into bankruptcy in the last 2 or 3 years. Could the gentleman comment? They have gotten that tax break, but yet we have seen a record number of small farmers going into bankruptcy.

Would it not seem that reducing these huge deficits and ensuring a prolonged recovery speaks more to insuring the economic growth and development of small farming than this particular issue of the estate tax?

Mr. WEBER. The gentleman raises a good point, and I would just respond by saying first of all I agree entirely with the gentleman. The biggest problem facing the small businesses and small farmers and probably the economy as a whole is interest rates. The interest rates that my farmers are paying today, and some of them borrowed as high as 24 or 25 percent for short-term operating money a couple of years ago, and they are still paying back some of those loans, that is the biggest problem, no question.

I might disagree with the gentleman on the exact cause of that problem. I happen to think we should look at our whole monetary structure and the way the Federal Reserve Board acts, and not simply focus on the deficit. But then if we solve that problem, before we had these high interest rates for almost 15 years, the major emphasis of virtually every farm organization from the Farmers Union and NFO on one side of the political spectrum to the Farm Bureau and the Cattlemen's Association on the other side, was to reform that estate tax law.

By rolling that back, granted we are not solving the problem just by solving the estate tax problem, and we still have this basic problem of our country's monetary structure, but the estate tax was a problem and will be a problem if we go back the way the Congressional Black Caucus wants us to.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentlewoman from Illinois (Mrs. COLLINS).

Mrs. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, as a coauthor and consistent champion of the Congressional Black Caucus (CBC) alternative budget, I rise to express my strong support of this measure. As in previous years, the CBC alternative budget embodies greater compassion for the needs of the disadvantaged and demonstrates fiscal responsibility without increasing unemployment or the deficit.

Given my chairmanship of the Subcommittee on Government Activities and Transportation, I would like to direct my comments to a vital component of this budget alternative—transportation.

A strong federally supported national network of multimodal and intermodal transportation has been an essential factor in the economic growth of this Nation and the establishment of its national defense. The CBC fully supports continuation of this Federal role.

In addition, the Federal role of rebuilding and maintaining our national transportatioin infrastructure will mean jobs, jobs and more jobs. Building highways, airports and harbors and modernizing those we already have will create jobs. Building subways, freeways, and harbor facilities will create jobs. Completed mass transit projects, budgets, and computerized air control systems will guarantee that our hard working citizens find work, travel to work, and complete their work.

The CBC budget takes a careful look at the authorization levels established in the Surface Transportation Assistance Act of 1982. This budget will fully fund transportation infrastructure programs and in the case of mass transit, go further.

The President's request did not completely eliminate fiscal year 1985 funding for mass transit operating assistance. However, it did propose funding at $545.5 million, or $322 million below the full authorization level.

The CBC, just as the Congress has in the past, rejects any phaseout or elimination of operating assistance. Our budget alternative would provide fiscal year 1985 funding consistent with the CBO current policy level of funding. Additionally, in fiscal year 1985 the CBC budget includes $559 million above baseline for discretionary capital projects as recommended by the Committee on Public Works and Transportation.

The implications for large metropolitan areas like Chicago, my own city, are enormous. First, by preserving the operating support levels and avoiding the Reagan proposed cuts, Chicago will receive nearly $22 million in additional operating support dollars. This will mean fare stability for CTA and RTA riders. Safety and service levels can be maintained.

In addition, based on Chicago's traditional share of discretionary capital funds, Chicago area public transit will receive nearly $6 million in additional funds to purchase new buses and trains and to modernize its stations and terminals. I am very proud of this result.

My own Government Operations Subcommittee on Government Activities and Transportation has held two, in a series of hearings on the mass transit picture in this country.

We have found that a reliable and steady flow of support from Washington is essential if the enormous investment in older urban systems is to be preserved and if newer systems are to adapt to the large population growth occurring in many in our younger cities. In addition, we have found that fare stability which can only occur through a combination of factors including Federal support, is essential if mass transit systems are to remain viable alternatives to the metropolitan rush hour atherosclerosis which clogs our urban arteries with cars and our atmosphere with pollutants.

A high percentage of low- and middle-income constituents depend upon public transportation to find and perform their jobs. A high percentage of our young and elderly depend upon it equally to get their education, attend their churches, do their shopping, obtain their medical care and visit their families and friends.

All other activities within this function are funded at CBA baseline levels for fiscal year 1985.

A comparison of this CBC alternative reveals that this budget provides the fullest funding level of all alternatives at a modest $50 million in excess of the Budget Committee baseline.

One final point, Mr. Chairman, no new legislation in the last 3 years has been more important to minority businessmen than section 105(f) of the Surface Transportation Assistance Act of 1982. This provision established that 10 percent of all highway and mass transit programs funded federally must be spent with firms owned by minority and disadvantaged Americans.

No program at DOT has received more of my attention as chairwoman of the Subcommittee on Government Activities and Transportation. This will continue.

I believe the CBC budget alternative strengthens that program because 10 percent of every dollar of continued and supplemented funding will be used in contracts in which minority firms get involved in highway and transit work. This will mean new jobs and prosperity for minorities who have historically been excluded from the program. In my own city of Chicago this will mean millions of dollars for minorities and minority firms. The same is true throughout the country.

I urge all of my colleagues to give full consideration to the CBC budget alternative which is frugal, humane, and the most responsive of all alternatives to the transportation needs of our Nation.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. FOWLER).

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, there is a wonderful scene in the play "My Fair Lady" where Henry Higgins, that old schoolmaster, is trying to teach Eliza Doolittle some manners.

He has tried everything. Finally, he gives up in frustration, throws down his books, calls her aside and says:

> The great secret in life, Dear Eliza, is really not whether you have good manners toward all people. In short, to act like you are already in heaven where there are no second class carriages and one soul is as good as another.

My friends, we have heard a lot of talk today about the different budget alternatives. But I can tell you this: The alternative on the floor today that we now debate is the best attempt to restore to this country the uniquely American notion of the same manner toward all people.

It is an intensely patriotic budget. It is a republican budget with a small "r". Due to the elitism of the administration's policies, where we have given the most to those who already have the most and taken the most from those who have the least, we must reestablish our Nation's balance. This alternative restores the same manner of policy to all Americans. It is the best hope for the development of our resources and the protection of our defense and it should be supported.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. LELAND).

Mr. LELAND. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Dixon constructive alternative budget. The constructive alternative budget remedies the unfairness of the President's economic policies and restores a sense of balance to the Federal budget. This budget would begin to make whole those in our society who have been most punished by President Reagan's Economic policies: The poor, the elderly, the handicapped, and female-headed households. The CBC budget calls for the greatest reduction in the insane deficits run up by the Reagan administration; deficits that threaten to cripple any sustained economic recovery by this Nation, and amount to a mortgaging of our children's future.

The energy and environmental sections of the budget reflect its balance. The Congressional Black Caucus budget alternative focuses more of the Department of Energy's efforts on energy conservation, development of alternative and renewable sources, and collection and dissemination of information. The Congressional Black Caucus budget reduces the Department of Energy's overblown nuclear programs and redistributes these savings to other vital programs.

This budget remedies the administration's current lopsided allocation of funds in favor of nuclear fission and fusion and away from conservation, fossil fuel, and renewable energy resources. The CBC budget steers funds back to energy efficiency and renewable resources and restores balance to our national energy policy. Conservation and solar energy programs which have been stripped by the administration's policies would be restored, and funding for these programs would be increased.

The CBC budget also would insure funding for the low-income weatherization program and the schools and hospital weatherization program. The administration has jeopardized the continued funding of these essential programs by proposing to fund them from oil overcharge funds currently held in trust by the Federal Government for restitution to overcharge customers. Because Congress has not authorized the use of existing overcharge funds as a substitute for regular appropriations, the CBC budget would continue to fund weatherization programs out of general revenues.

In the environmental arena, the CBC budget would continue funding for the urban parks and recreation program and the Youth Conservation Corps, two essential programs the administration would abolish. The CBC budget also calls for increased funding for the Environmental Protection Agency's pollution control and abatement program.

The budget also recognizes that when scarce public resources are used for private purposes, the American public should be reimbursed. Therefore, it calls for user fees for ports and waterways; increased fees for grazing on public lands; increased ocean dumping fees; and the establishment of a minimum royalty for public lands mineral production. After years of neglect of environmental concerns by this administration, the CBC budget would reassert this Nation's commitment to the management and maintenance of our natural resources.

Mr. Chairman, I believe the Congressional Black Caucus' constructive alternative budget is the most balanced and the fairest budget we will consider this year. I urge my colleagues to support this budget.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. COYNE).

Mr. COYNE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Dixon substitute budget.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the Congressional Black Caucus alternative budget.

This measure would reduce the Federal deficit by $323 billion over 3 years by taking the steps we need to take if we are to bring the deficit under control.

Congress must assert its power of the pursestring if we are to avert still higher budget deficits offered by this administration. The administration proposes greater cuts in domestic programs while increasing spending for the military and would, after 3 years, reduce the budget deficit by $149 billion. The Budget Committee's proposal, which I also intend to support, would reduce the deficit by $182.35 billion over the same period of time while reducing military spending and preserving domestic programs. The caucus alternative, while reducing the deficit by $323 billion, would also have the effect of reordering our national priorities.

The arguments by the administration and its defenders on the current budget deficit are especially difficult to comprehend. They wring their hands and point fingers as if the $192 billion deficit we face next year were not a problem of their own making.

But wait a moment. Who is in charge here? The budget deficit for the last year in the Carter administration could have been nearly eliminated by the cuts in social spending brought about by the Gramm-Latta budget reconciliation bill in 1981, if that was indeed the intent of the administration.

From where, then, did the budget deficit of nearly $200 billion come? The deficit did not develop, to any great measure, because we feed too many children in school lunch programs.

It did not come because we attempt to provide shelter for the poorest of the poor.

The deficit did not grow because we committed ourselves as a Nation to the education of our young people, the care of our elderly, or to the assistance of our handicapped.

The mammoth deficit, as should be apparent to all but those who choose not to see, is the direct result of a shift in the Federal axis since this administration took office. Preserving tax breaks for the well-to-do, thus restricting the amount of operating revenue available, has not caused the administration to reconsider its plans to spend $1.5 trillion on the military over a 5-year period. To finance the military buildup, the administration has resorted to deficit spending on a sustained basis, a sort of khaki Keynesianism that channels capital from areas of production to areas of destruction.

There are alternatives. We can trim domestic programs which need to be trimmed. We must, in the process, keep in mind recent history. The wide swinging ax of the Office of Management and Budget has swung for 3 years, leaving little to cut in social programs without reaching to the bone.

The massive increase in military spending affords us a much greater prospect of putting our fiscal house in order. Here is where the big reductions should come.

We can also begin to plug tax loopholes, stemming the flow of dollars away from the Treasury, thereby reducing the amount of red ink in the budget.

At this point, I would like to share with my colleagues an alternative approach to the Federal budget prepared by the Congressional Budget Office. They are not all contained in the Black Caucus alternative, nor is it likely that all of these options, provided by the Congressional Budget Office, could be adopted by this Congress anytime in the near future. They would cut the budget where it needs to be cut, mainly in the military. At the same time, they would begin to provide significant tax revenue to run the Government. With these options, the Federal deficit could be lowered not by $200 billion over the next 5 years, as suggested by a recent Business Week article, but by more than $500 billion over the same period. The economic times we live in demand that we consider bold alternatives such as these if we are to do more than chip away at the Federal deficit.

The following figures are based on savings and increased revenue for the 5-year period beginning in fiscal 1985. Savings and revenue projections are provided by the Congressional Budget Office.

BUDGET REDUCTIONS: NONMILITARY

Increase charges for the private use of the space shuttle—Savings: $1.6 billion.

Charge more realistic prices for Federal irrigation water—Savings: $330 million.

End the wool and Mohair payment program—Savings: $580 million.

Terminate the honey price support system—Savings: $160 million.

Revise the Agricultural Commodity price support policy—Savings: $40.95 billion.

Overhaul the Federal airport assistance program—Savings: $2.1 billion.

Index the unemployment insurance taxable wage base—Savings: $9.45 billion.

Require withholding of child support payments from wages—Savings: $145 million.

Improve timber sales cash management—Savings: $425 million.

BUDGET REDUCTIONS: MILITARY

Reduce procurement of the F-15 fighter—Savings: $8.7 billion.

Limit production of the M-2 Bradley Fighting Vehicle—Savings: $2 billion.

Reduce construction of new submarines and amphibious landing ships while extending the life of existing ships—Savings: $6.5 billion.

Limit real growth in Defense Department supporting procurement—Savings: $18.1 billion.

Alter the airlift expansion program, cancel C-17—Savings: $7.8 billion.

Require a modest outpatient fee at military medical facilities—Savings: $845 million.

Cancel the Low Altitude Navigation and Targeting Infrared System for Night program (LANTIRN)—Savings: $2.8 billion.

Slow growth in Defense Department operations and maintenance—Savings: $15.7 billion.

Suspend production of the F-14 fighter/interceptor, while proceeding with upgrade—Savings: $3.8 billion.

Reduce the pace of tactical Air Force increases—Savings: $2.1 billion.

Reduce the number of active duty Navy personnel assigned to shore duty—Savings: $1 billion.

Stop production of the A-6 bomber—Savings: $250 million.

Cancel the division air defense gun—Savings: $1.9 billion.

Defer development of the DDG-51 battleship while speeding up procurement of CG-47 class ships—Savings: $6.2 billion.

Revise cost of living allowances for working age military retirees—Savings: $21.7 billion.

Restore enlisted/officer ratios—Savings: $2.7 billion.

Limit real growth increases in Defense Department research and development—Savings: $14.1 billion.

Cancel the MX missile—Savings: $34 billion.

Halt production of the B-1 bomber—Savings: $14.3 billion.

Recover military medical care costs from private health insurers—Savings: $1.405 billion.

REVENUE INCREASES

Do away with the oil depletion allowance and expensing of intangible drilling costs—Added revenue: $29 billion.

Eliminate capital gains treatment for timber—Added revenue: $3.4 billion.

End the deduction for excess bad debt reverses by commercial banks and savings and loans—Added revenue: $4.5 billion.

Restrict tax-motivated leasing by nonprofit institutions—Added revenue: $16 billion.

Repeal the net interest exclusion—Added revenue: $14.0 billion.

Repeal reduced rates on the first $100,000 of corporate income—Added revenue: $42 billion.

Require full basis adjustment for the investment tax credit—Added revenue: $14.3 billion.

Extend coverage of withholding tax to royalties—Added revenue: $3.9 billion.

Freeze estate and gift credit tax rates—Added revenue: $8.2 billion.

Lengthen building depreciation from 15 to 20 years—Added revenue: $12.6 billion.

Update income averaging—Added revenue: $6.5 billion.

Improve taxpayer compliance—Added revenue: $16.9 billion.

Speed settlement of tax court cases—Added revenue: $400 million.

Retain taxes on cigarettes and air travel—Added revenue: $12.5 billion.

Restrict indexation to inflation Over 3 percent—Added revenue: $101.25 billion.

Impose a 10 percent corporate income tax surtax—Added revenue: $38 billion.

Limit to 50 percent of the amount spent the tax deduction for business entertainment and meals—Added revenue: $5.2 billion.

Accelerate payments of withheld social security taxes by State and local governments—Added revenue: $1 billion.

Accelerate collections of customs duties, alcohol and tobacco taxes—Added revenue: $1.2 billion.

Reducing the Federal budget deficit is not the impossible task which some would have us believe. But to do so, we cannot, as the administration suggests, leave military spending and tax loopholes nearly untouched. We must be willing to look at the big picture and be ready to make decisions that will affect spending and revenues in a major way. For this reason, I oppose the administration budget initiative. It would reduce the deficit by only $149 billion over 3 years while imposing further cuts in social spending and increasing military spending.

The Black Caucus alternative stands in stark contrast to this approach. It saves money by eliminating unneeded military weapons systems. It would plug tax loopholes so that corporations pay their fair share in taxes. In addition, it would limit the final installment of the Kemp/Roth tax cut to the first $50,000 of a person's income. It would, however, do more than simply eliminate programs in order to reduce the deficit. It would embark on an effort to put Americans back to work. Included in the caucus alternative is $3.5 billion for the Community Renewal Employment Act, a measure which would employ thousands in repairing public facilities and making community improvements.

The budget resolution recommended by the Budget Committee would cut more in defense spending and less in entitlement and domestic discretionary programs than would the administration plan.

In the areas of defense, the committee budget provides an increase above inflation adjusted levels of $63.2 billion in budget authority and $44.8 billion in outlays over the next 3 years, $55.6 billion less than the administration proposal.

While the administration would reduce entitlements by $30 billion over 3 years, the committee proposal would decrease non-means-tested programs by $12.4 billion, while adding $2.2 billion to means-tested programs, for an overall reduction of $10.2 billion. Social security and other means-tested programs would be exempt from cuts.

Discretionary domestic spending would be limited to 3.5 percent above current levels, less than the rate of inflation. Where the administration would cut $10.4 billion in this area, the committee's proposal would mean domestic discretionary spending would be reduced by $4.6 billion.

The proposal also provides for $49.8 billion in new revenue over 3 years, $4.8 billion more than anticipated in the administration proposal.

As it stands, the committee budget resolution does not provide for increases in revenue above current law. A pay-as-you-go amendment would allow a revenue increase of $49.8 billion over 3 years to allow certain defense spending above the rate of inflation and for increases in some low-income programs, including nutrition, training, handicapped and compensatory education programs.

Mr. Chairman, if we are to right our fiscal course, this House must take appropriate budgetary action. The committee's proposal is superior to the budget put forth by the administration because it protects social programs while calling for less of an increase in military spending. But it does propose 3.5 percent real growth in military spending, under the pay-as-you-go approach. Of the $49.8 billion in additional revenue projected under pay-as-you-go, $44.8 billion will go to military, with only $5 billion left for all other purposes. For those of us who argued last year that the military budget was too large, a call for an increase in military spending above inflation is more than a little disturbing.

Mr. Chairman, I intend to support the resolution offered by the Budget Committee because it is far superior to that put forth by the administration. The Black Caucus alternative, however, addresses the critical problem of military spending far more squarely and for that reason, in addition to the reasons I have already stated, it shall receive my vote.

Restoring fairness to our tax system, reducing military spending, and directing a Federal effort to put people back to work should be the core of any budget resolution this House approves. The inequity of the Gramm-Latta-

Reagan approach, which suggests that the road to recovery lies in rewarding the wealthy while punishing the poor, should be clear to us by now. A recently released Congressional Budget Office Study indicates just how fair the Gramm/Latta/Reagan approach to Government actually is. As a result of budget and tax actions taken by this Congress since 1981, families with incomes of less than $10,000 a year have lost, on average, $390 a year. Those with incomes of $40,000 to $80,000 have gained, on average, $2,900 a year. As we go up the income ladder, the benefits really begin to roll in. Families with incomes of $80,000 or greater have gained, on average, $8,720 a year.

At this point, I would like to include in the RECORD a chart which indicates just how the budget and tax decisions made since 1981 have affected families:

TAX AND BUDGET CUTS: THE IMPACT ON HOUSEHOLD INCOMES

[Projections for the 1984 calendar year, numbers have been rounded]

	All households	$10,000 or less	$10,000 to $20,000	$20,000 to $40,000	$40,000 to $80,000	$80,000 or more
Gain from tax cuts	$1,090	$20	$330	$1,200	$3,080	$8,390
Loss in cash benefits	−170	−250	−210	−130	−90	−90
Loss in noncash benefits [1]	−100	−160	−90	−60	−80	−40
Net gain or loss	820	−390	30	1,010	2,900	8,270

We cannot continue to squeeze those who have too little to make life easier for those who are already comfortable. I urge my colleagues to vote yes on the Congressional Black Caucus alternative budget, an initiative which would restore sanity to our spending priorities and fairness to our tax system.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. FRANK.

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Chairman, I want to express my gratitude to our colleagues in the Black Caucus for the detailed and thoughtful work that has resulted in their bringing forward a budget that Members can vote for with a great deal of pride and a great deal of assurance.

No one in voting for a budget resolution has to agree to every detail of the vast document that any budget reflects and there is always room for subsequent change.

But better than anything I have seen, the Black Caucus has reached the kind of balance that we need if we are to restore the national policy of this country to the place where it ought to be.

They have shown we can have a strong defense and still have fiscal restraint; they have shown we can have compassion and still have a concern for the budget deficit.

This budget does more to reduce the deficit and does more to reduce the social deficit we have incurred. We not only have a fiscal deficit in terms of how much we owe at the Federal level; we have now created in this country in recent years a growing social deficit in which the poorest, the neediest, the most vulnerable have been deprived systematically to fund excessive military spending; to fund tax breaks that simply reward the wealthy without producing any concomitant economic benefit to the country.

This is a budget that puts America where it ought to be and I hope Members will vote for it.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire of the Chair how much time I have left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California (Mr. DIXON) has 21 minutes remaining and the gentlewoman from California (Ms. FIEDLER) has 31 minutes remaining.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the distinguished gentlewoman from New York (Ms. FERRARO).

Ms. FERRARO. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding and I rise in support of the Dixon substitute. it is the only budget we will vote on in the budget process that makes a serious effort to ease the suffering that has been inflicted on millions of poor Americans, especially women, children, and the elderly.

It recognizes the reality that the current economic recovery has not reached millions of Americans who live in depressed areas. The number of Americans labeled "structurally unemployed," which means they have no job, no job skills, and no hope of becoming contributing partners in this economy, stands at 9 million, more than there were before the Reagan administration took office.

This budget holds out a helping hand to those Americans who need it most. It is a statement of principle, a commitment to opportunity.

I must say, however, that I do not support every provision of this package. I am disturbed by the tax increases it proposes—they are too high. But today's vote is not the end of this process. If this budget is passed, it will go to a conference with the Senate budget. I fully expect that most of the tax increase would be dropped at that time.

Similarly, with respect to the defense spending proposals in this budget, I feel it goes too far in slowing the growth of Pentagon spending. Certainly the Reagan defense buildup has gone far beyond what is necessary for national defense or affordable to our national economy. But this budget swings the pendulum back too far, especially in 1986 and 1987.

Again, though, should this budget pass, it will be compromised with a Senate budget that increases defense spending by 7.5 percent above inflation. That compromise would produce a defense increase of around 3 or 4 percent above inflation, which is certainly acceptable and prudent.

No budget is perfect, and this one is no exception.

But what it does that is most important is make a statement about priorities. It restores moneys domestic programs that have been severely cut by this administration and deals with education problems that have not been addressed over the last several years. It funds jobs programs and city infrastructure programs. It seems to me that this budget defines the direction we as a nation should be going.

□ 1150

We have to recognize the fact that the Federal Government has a function beside collecting taxes and delivering mail and that is to take care of the needs of the people of this country.

Ms. FIEDLER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 9 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. KASICH).

Mr. KASICH. Mr. Chairman, let me point a couple of things out that are disturbing about the proposal. I think the gentlewoman from New York just touched on a very important factor and that is that the new revenues called for under this proposal amount to $182.6 billion over the next 3 years. Those new revenues of $182.6 billion over the next 3 years compare to other budget proposals that will be coming before the House, for example, of $76.2 billion under the Democratic Study Committee, $47.2 billion under the MacKay-Nelson proposal, and $49.8 billion under the House Budget Committee proposal. So we are talking an average of somewhere around $50 billion in new revenue in all the budget proposals as compared to $182 billion in the budget proposal that is now before the House.

What is particularly disturbing is if you assume that this is a practical document, you come about with a very serious problem. When you take a look at the proposals that are made in the defense budget, they include the elimination of the MX, the Trident, the Pershing, the cruise, the B-1, a reduction in the number of troops. The House has consistently rejected that kind of program. And while the Black Caucus may suggest that the military spending ought to be reduced below the House Budget Committee proposal or the Republican Budget Committee proposal, it is very unlikely that that will actually happen.

So, we are literally talking about the Federal Government increasing its spending as well as increasing the percentage of GNP that Government is taking.

Now, let me tell the Members why I think this is important. It really follows the line of the gentleman from New York. Over the period of the last 10 years, some countries within the European Community have absorbed as much as 50 percent of their GNP when local, State, and Federal spending are put together.

Understand what I just said. When you take local, State, and Federal spending, GNP is absorbed by about 50 percent.

Over that same 10-year period in those countries there have been no new jobs created, zero. Zero economic growth because the percentage of government spending, or the percentage of wealth produced by people as absorbed by the government, has destroyed the ability to create jobs.

In this country, we have traditionally lived within less than one-third of GNP being absorbed by Government. And over the period of the last 10 years we have created 20 million new jobs. If we want to create a growth economy, one that will allow job creation, we cannot make the same mistake that those in the European Community have made. Remember, those who are disadvantaged or least skilled are the last hired and the first ones laid off. They will be the ones hurt the most. We absolutely must put ourselves in the position of having a growth economy. If we repeat the European Community's mistakes, we will also experience the same problems—zero economic growth and zero opportunity.

What we must do is keep a handle on the growth in GNP absorption by Government, for that is what will control the creation of opportunity for our people, and what very well may deny them employment if not kept in check.

Mr. KEMP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KASICH. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEMP. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Well, there is a legitimate concern that is expressed very eloquently in the CBC budget which is that the recovery is not being extended into the areas of the Nation that are in desperate shape economically and need assistance.

A recovery that affects the Nation is one thing, but a recovery that leaves behind the cities or urban areas or one population or another is not a true recovery. That is a point that I tried to make earlier in my remarks.

I wanted to say to my friends who are still listening, that what I was trying to get at is we need to do more in the inner city. We need to do more for unemployment among teenagers and minorities and Hispanics, blacks and women, those who are left outside of the general recovery that we are seeing.

My question, I guess, to the gentleman from California, other than the Community Renewal Employment Act, which is $3.5 billion and $2 billion for the youth incentive employment program, why did not the Congressional Black Caucus, I would say to my friend from California, what happened to the idea that has been supported by liberals and conservatives and black and white, Hispanic, BILL GRAY from Philadelphia, and BOBBY GARCIA from the South Bronx, where is the urban enterprise zone? Not President Reagan's, or JACK KEMP's or BILL GRAY's or BOB GARCIA's, but where is the concept of targeting tax incentives compensatorily fashioned to create entrepreneurship in the inner city?

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KASICH. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DIXON. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The Congressional Black Caucus budget does have an earned income tax concept that provides incentives for employers to hire those in minority communities where unemployment has been traditionally high. It does not have the urban enterprise concept.

There is more than one way, as we say, to skin a cat. The gentleman has ticked off three or four. The Hawkins bill. Certainly the tax credit for corporations. Those will go a long way in relieving the unemployment problem.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KASICH. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DELLUMS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The gentleman from California is always willing to listen to the argument on the other side. I tried to listen to my colleague's argument, and in doing so I have concluded that my colleague's argument is flawed.

First of all, the gentleman suggests that if you increase Government spending, you increase the percentage of GNP, reducing the capacity to generate jobs. And the gentleman started arguing with respect to the military budget.

And it is precisely in that area that we are talking about reducing. If you argue to increase the military budget, I would suggest you are increasing the Government function, you are increasing the percentage of GNP, and from the gentleman's own argument, decreasing on an increased basis the capacity to generate jobs.

So the gentleman is arguing against his own point.

Mr. KASICH. What I am saying to the gentleman from California, I think he is very aware of this, is that the House has consistently voted to continue many of these projects. I think we will continue to vote that way, which means that you are going to have higher and higher levels of spending because added to your social spending list, you are going to have some increases in the defense area, which means the percentage of GNP absorbed by Government will rise higher and higher.

The point I am trying to make is within the European Community, as governments within the European Community have moved to absorb more and more and more of what their people have produced in the private sector, no new jobs have been created.

They have a stagnant economy over there which means that those at the top or rich get richer, while the middle class and the poor get poorer.

I think what we need to do in this country is create a growth economy. And there is a direct link between the percentage of GNP absorbed by Government and job-creating capability. As I said, in this country, with less than one-third of GNP going to Government, we have created in the last 10 years 20 million new jobs. That is what I think we are all about here, is job creation, job opportunity, similar to the arguments I think that John Kennedy used to make, that what we need is a rising tide that lifts all boats. I think we want to get on the right side of GNP as far as a job-creating environment and job-creating formula is concerned, which means a limit on what the Government ought to absorb from what we produce as private-sector individuals.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KASICH. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DELLUMS. I appreciate the gentleman's clarification, and I understand the gentleman's point now, and the point is well taken. I am simply saying, to go back to the gentleman's earlier argument, that he does not believe that the House will actually challenge any of these weapon systems, I remind the gentleman of the statement made by the Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinberger. He said that as we cut the military budget we are increasing the problem in the outyears because we are really not cutting weapon systems.

What this budget is an effort to do is to challenge my colleagues at the level of policy objectives and within the context of that discussion to actually cut weapon systems.

Now, maybe the gentleman is absolutely right that our colleagues will not do it. But that does not preclude our responsibility to challenge the body to a higher level of action.

Mr. KASICH. Let me reclaim my time and say that the gentleman certainly has been active in advancing the argument, one that I do not happen to agree with. We had the President of France over here, who argued that we need to have the GLCM, we need the Pershing II's in Europe because of the threat of the Soviet Union. We debated the B-1.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. KASICH) has expired.

Ms. FIEDLER. Mr. Chairman, I yield an additional 30 seconds to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. KASICH. I think the systems are necessary. There is not a candidate for President in these United States, with the exception of Jesse Jackson, who is not calling for real increases in defense spending. I compliment the gentleman on his activity in the procurement area, and I think he is very well aware what I have been doing in the spare parts reform area, and there is no one who has been tougher on that than I. But what I am saying is that there is no question the systems are going to continue, although we may continue to have a debate. What I am concerned about is the ultimate level of GNP growth in solving the problem and having a realistic program to do it.

Ms. FIEDLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KASICH. I yield to the gentlewoman from California.

Ms. FIEDLER. Mr. Chairman, I would just like to make one point. We often talk about cutting defense, and we think in terms of cutting out some of the terrible tools of war. But I think it is also important that when we take a look at the reduction in defense, we are also talking about reducing significant numbers of jobs that are currently being held. For every billion dollars in defense spending, there is somewhere between 30,000 and 50,000 jobs being created. While that is not a good argument to invest defense money, it is a fact of life in terms of the investment.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS).

Mr. DELLUMS. I thank the gentleman for yielding 1 minute to me.

Mr. Chairman, I would simply say to the gentlewoman from California that if you look at the Congressional Black Caucus budget alternative, in the defense function it is precisely for the reason that the gentlewomen raised the question of the loss of jobs that we place $6 billion in a new category where we say that if the Congress of the United States makes a decision that is in the national interest, for example, to cut the B-1, that a local community should not have to absorb the economic impact of that decision by the loss jobs. So with that $6 billion we then generate a program that puts those, say, 1,800 workers to work not building the B-1 bomber but moving to a reconversion approach where we talk about building peaceful approaches to life.

The gentlewomen raises an excellent question. But what we are saying in this budget is that we have an answer to that, to free our colleagues from the more pedestrian, mundane political consideration of whether people lose jobs in their districts, and are able to make the policy decision as to whether we need a weapon system. And if that has an adverse impact on the local community, we generate funds so that people do not lose jobs. The gentlewomen's point is well taken, but we try to deal with it.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. OBEY).

Mr. OBEY. Mr. Chairman, there are a number of amendments today which are legitimate efforts to unite liberals and conservatives alike to attack the deficit problem in a realistic way. I think the MacKay amendment is one, for instance, because it defines budget baselines above which we should not be spending without new taxes to finance that spending. But that has a problem in that it leaves no real negotiating room with the Senate for priority adjustment. The McHugh amendment most accurately reflects my view of what this House ought to be able to minimally achieve by way of attacks on the deficit.

But I frankly believe that the Dixon amendment is best in terms of departing from the timidity which has plagued this town and which has prevented us from really attacking the budget deficit in a really dramatic way.

I do not agree with some of the military assumptions made in this budget. I certainly do not agree with some of the domestic numbers, and I specifically do not agree with the estate tax suggestions or the agricultural area, for instance, and I have questions about some of the social spending that is suggested. But the amendment is preferable to other alternatives for one basic reason: This is the only amendment before us that makes a sufficiently dramatic attack on the deficit to really make an economic difference.

I would also point out, for those of you who have concerns about specifics within this resolution, that the journey is not determined by where you start; the journey is determined by where you wind up. And this is the only alternative before us which gives us an opportunity, through the conference process with the Senate, to wind up where we ought to be, with much larger deficit reductions than we will have under any other alternative, and also gives us the opportunity to produce a mix of military and domestic programs that has some degree of social equity. It also, I believe, is the only one of the alternatives that sufficiently recognizes that concurrently with budget deficit reductions we also have to make some specific investments in areas that are essential for the future growth of the economy, those three being education, health and manpower.

I have just come from a meeting with Nobel Laureates who have laid out the dramatic shortcomings in the budget on basic health research. There is only one budget alternative before us which allows us to meet those needs within the context of a greatly reduced budget deficit. This is the alternative, and I would urge the Members' support for it on that basis.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. JONES), the chairman of the Committee on the Budget.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, again I want to bring to the attention of the House the contents of this substitute. I think it is important that what we vote for in a budget resolution today, we be prepared to vote for when appropriations and other bills come along to enforce the budget.

Before I do that, I do want to commend the gentleman from California (Mr. DIXON) and other members of the Congressional Black Caucus for presenting to us the only true alternative to the approach that most of the other substitutes and the committee package adopts in terms of budget policy. I think there is a clear-cut difference between this alternative and the other budgets being presented today.

But I think we should be clear as to those differences. As has been pointed out, this substitute calls for a $183 billion tax increase over the next 3 years, and that is more than double any of the other substitutes which are before the House today. It includes elimination of a number of tax expenditures, such as the depletion and expensing allowances on natural resource extraction, plus alternative minimum tax on corporations, limitation on mortgage interest deductions for multiple homes, and many other things.

On entitlements, instead of cutting entitlements it increases entitlements by $35 billion over the next 3 years.

On defense there is no increase in defense expenditure of any sort. Instead, there is 14.9 percent negative real growth in defense expenditures.

On nondefense, discretionary domestic programs, there is an increase over the House Budget Committee baseline of $64 billion.

These are the elements that the Members would be voting on in this Congressional Black Caucus substitute. It is their honest view of where America ought to go. I submit, however, that this House is not going to enforce it. I merely point out to my colleagues again, as I have on each of the substitutes, one simple fact: what you vote for today on a budget resolution is the way you should be prepared to vote in implementing the budget next week, next month, and over the rest of this year.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, I inquire of the Chair as to what time is left on both sides.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California (Mr. DIXON) has 14 minutes remaining; the gentlewoman from California (Ms. FIEDLER) has 21 minutes remaining.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, I believe I am entitled to close. I do not know if the other side intends to use all of their time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is incorrect. The opposition is entitled to close. We went through this yesterday.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. STOKES).

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Chairman, today I rise with great pride and pleasure to endorse the fourth Congressional Black Caucus constructive alternative budget. Mr. Chairman, my pride in being associated with this effort is derived from the fact that the Congressional Black Caucus alternative budget for fiscal year 1985 is a leadership budget. This budget charts a new course for America. It is a budget that casts aside the conventional wisdom that a rising Federal deficit means that we cannot take care of the Nation's poor and infirm. It is a budget that rejects the obviously absurd notion that we must continue to feed an already bloated military budget—that we must continue to pile food on a plate that is already full. It is a budget that dismisses the assumption that our current tax policies, which have drained revenues from the Federal Treasury with few visible economic benefits, are untouchable and above reform.

The CBC has had the courage and foresight to carefully examine our Nation's goals and objectives and to develop a blueprint for achieving them. This is what the budget process ought to be about—not simply a charade of posturing and political debate about how much we can cut programs that help poor people and how much we can increase defense. In our alternative budget, the CBC recommends a comprehensive reordering of our national priorities and the most effective and efficient ways to meet those priorities. The CBC budget includes additional resources, above current services levels, for education, employment, community and neighborhood development, social services, and basic income security programs.

Moreover, the CBC budget demonstrates that the goals of providing some of the most basic needs for the impoverished, the disabled and handicapped, the homeless and the elderly, need not be accomplished at the expense of maintaining and enhancing economic progress. Indeed, the CBC budget is humane and fair and, at the same time, does more to reduce the Federal deficit than any other budget proposal pending before this body. Let us be clear in recognizing the fact that the CBC alternative budget achieves a larger deficit reduction than any other budget plan. In fiscal year 1985, the deficit would be reduced to $154 billion under the CBC plan, declining to $104 billion by fiscal year 1987.

Yes, we can reduce the Federal deficit in a meaningful fashion and, thus, insure a smooth and upward path toward recovery from the economic abyss created by "Reaganomics." The CBC deficit reduction plan involves the elimination of excessive and wasteful spending practices in the Pentagon and terminating support for military weapons and systems which are fueling the nuclear arms race. We do not need the MX missile, space weapons, and the other creations of the military establishment which have little real value in improving national security. The CBC deficit plan involves returning to the Federal Treasury precious revenues that have been squandered through liberal tax reductions for the well to do and corporations, and realining the tax systems so that all individuals and corporate entities pay their fair share.

With this extensive restructuring of our defense and tax policies; with creative and bold budget policies that reject the "business as usual" approach, the CBC budget provides a blueprint for leading this Nation back to greatness.

I would like to spend a few moments focusing on the CBC alternative budget recommendations in the area of education, because without education our Nation cannot be great. The CBC alternative budget recognizes the urgency with which the Federal Government must address the "rising tide of mediocrity" in public education about which President Reagan's National Commission on Excellence in Education spoke.

The CBC budget includes $22.9 billion for education, more than $6 billion above current services levels, for promoting both excellence and equal opportunity in education. Unlike President Reagan, we know that it costs money to achieve these goals. We also know that the cost of ignorance and illiteracy in our society is far greater than the cost of education. Thus, the CBC budget restores funding for nearly every aspect of Federal education assistance, the value of which has dangerously deteriorated since 1980. Under the CBC alternative spending plan, the chapter 1 program for disadvantaged students would be significantly expanded to address the alarming increase in illiteracy among our youth and to extend the tremendously successful chapter 1 programs at the elementary level into our junior high schools. To improve the chances that every minority youth—not just one out of two youth—will be able to obtain a decent job, the CBC budget proposes greatly increased funding for vocational training programs. The CBC budget also increases aid to college students so that ability and motivation, not income status, are once again the determinants of who goes to college.

In closing, let me say, Mr. Chairman, that the CBC alternative budget speaks to the hopes and aspirations of millions of Americans. The CBC budget would move this Nation forward on the path of economic prosperity, while restoring a sense of human compassion and caring in our Federal policies. It deserves your thoughtful and careful consideration. Thus, I urge you to support the CBC alternative budget. It is our best hope for our communities, our country and our people.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. FORD).

Mr. FORD of Tennessee. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, the CBC alternative budget has three areas which I would like to address specifically.

First, social services; second, social security and medicare; third, income security.

From my perspective as chairman of the Ways and Means Subcommittee on Public Assistance and Unemployment Compensation, I have seen the pain and suffering wrought by these past 3 years of Reagan cuts.

When Ronald Reagan was campaigning for the Presidency against then President Carter, he often asked his audience, "Are you better off today than you were 4 years ago?" For the poor of this country, the answer is clearly no.

The number of poor Americans is rising at an alarming rate. The Reagan administration has succeeded in removing hundreds of thousands of America's poor children from AFDC, they have no health coverage, and are eating worse today than they were before the Reagan administration took office. The modest tax break we provided to the working poor—the earned income tax credit—is eroding. The evidence is clear and it is frightening.

According to the Census Bureau, no matter how you measure it, the number of poor people in the United States is steadily increasing. In 1978, 24.5 million people lived in poverty, in 1982, the number grew to 34.4 million—15 percent of all Americans. Why is the poverty rate on the rise?

More people are poor today because of the Reagan administration's systematic retreat from our obligation to insure economic and social justice for all citizens. While calling for a return to traditional family values, this administration has callously claimed that people are hungry and homeless because they want to be, preferring to ignore the harsh reality of what it means to be poor in the United States.

Just last week, the General Accounting Office reported the initial results of its indepth analysis of the massive Reagan administration cuts to our Nation's most basic welfare program, aid to families with dependent children (AFDC). What did GAO find? That roughly 493,000 families lost AFDC and medicaid altogether and the vast majority of them could not make up the loss in income and certainly could not afford to buy the health coverage they needed. Nearly 1 million children—our future—were hurt by these cuts.

These cuts have resulted in unwarranted pain and hardship for poor single mothers who are struggling to support their families. But how did these families respond to the loss of AFDC? Did they do the economically sensible thing and quit their jobs to get back on welfare? No. They continued to work and were rewarded with a Reagan administration tax policy that lent a helping hand to the most fortunate of America's citizens. For the working mother with two children and earnings equal to the poverty level, payroll taxes increased between 1978 and 1984.

Recognizing that the Reagan administration is indifferent to the needs of poor Americans, I recently joined with my colleagues, Congressmen RANGEL and WAXMAN to introduce the Omnibus Anti-Poverty Act of 1984. H.R. 4920 is a modest but important attempt to halt the rise in the poverty rate and restore this country's commitment to its least fortunate citizens and I am pleased that the alternative budget to the Congressional Black Caucus would accommodate modest improvements to benefit programs for the Nation's neediest Americans.

The indignities of decent Americans being dropped from programs for no reason, having to beg for help, the irony of working people on the edge of poverty having to seek public assistance while the rich get more and more benefits. These factors are just a few of the reasons I can rise with sincerity and good faith and ask you to thoughtfully consider this CBC budget alternative.

For the fourth year, the Congressional Black Caucus has introduced a constructive alternative budget as part of the debate over our national priorities.

Our alternatives have embodied greater compassion for the needs of disadvantaged and working Americans, fiscal responsibility in terms of defense expenditures, tax equity, control of inflation without increasing unemployment, greater attention towards our domestic needs, and a deficit that has consistently been below that proposed by President Reagan.

Mr. Chairman, we have seen the results of the Reagan experiment; 1.5 million more men and women are unemployed than before he took office; the largest tax cut in our history has redistributed income to the wealthy while those with incomes below $20,000 receive less in tax cuts than they have lost as a result of budget cuts; the CBC budget charts a different course for America. It restores fairness and balance in our budget priorities. The Congressional Black Caucus is disturbed that the fundamental issue of fairness is being eclipsed by the massive budget deficits which are the legacy of Reaganomics. The structural deficit resulting from rising defense spending and declining revenues, indeed, threatens to push interest rates upward and choke off what modest reductions there have been in unemployment during the past year. Yet we believe Congress must not forget those segments of our society who have suffered most under the Reagan administration. The modified freeze proposals would lock in place unacceptably high levels of defense spending and unacceptably low levels of domestic assistance. New priorities are needed.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Social service programs and agencies have had increased demands placed on them for essential services like food, clothing, and housing, swallowing up the agencies' limited time and resources, and forcing them to turn away many in need of assistance. At the same time, the recession brought with it calamitous levels of unemployment, and the accompanying child and spouse abuse, drug addiction, alcoholism, and mental illness.

The Federal Government presently funds a wide range of social services programs, most of which serve the poor and disadvantaged. The largest program, title XX of the Social Security Act, is a block grant to States for such activities as Meals on Wheels for the elderly or hiring welfare recipients to staff day care centers. About 5 million people are served by this program. Other social services programs include day care, child welfare services, foster care, adoption assistance, and rehabilitation services.

The administration intends to consolidate 12 existing programs into 1 social services block grant. It provides $1.4 billion (27 percent) less than the comparable Carter administration requests. Funding for these programs is 24 percent below the amount provided in fiscal year 1981 and about 32 percent below the level necessary to maintain current services. The CBC budget provides the restoration of $1 billion of these callous cuts.

The administration's proposal would hit the poor the hardest since most of the programs to be consolidated serve this population. For example, half of all title XX beneficiaries also receive AFDC or SSI. In addition, the administration has indicated that there would be few, if any, requirements that social services funds be targeted to low-income and disadvantaged populations as is required under the present law. Thus, the poor would be forced to compete for fewer funds with the disabled, elderly, orphans, and others who need assistance.

Depending on how States implement the administration's funding cuts, substantial numbers of people could be knocked out of programs or, if the States choose to eliminate the program entirely, all present beneficiaries would lose services. Thus, the suggested budget cuts could affect:

Over 900,000 low-income aged, blind, and disabled persons who receive SSI and benefits from title XX services such as homemaker care and Meals on Wheels;

Nearly 600,000 children who participate in day care programs, many of whose mothers receive AFDC and rely on day care to allow them to participate in training activities or jobs;

One million children who are reported as seriously abused or neglected each year and thus could benefit from child welfare services;

About 500,000 children who live in foster care homes or institutions;

Some 1.4 million handicapped persons receiving vocational rehabilitation services, 75 percent of whom have incomes below the poverty line; and

Approximately 43,000 children served by shelters for runaway youth and programs aimed at reuniting families.

The Federal Government has traditionally not done enough for the recipients of these programs, with the scope and funding often limited. Their care has been left primarily to State and local agencies, with Federal programs created only after it had become clear that no one was meeting the needs of those less fortunate. The CBC budget alternative addresses these needs in a responsible and fiscally prudent manner. The CBC budget adds a modest $300,000 in fiscal years 1985, 1986, and 1987 for a total of $900,000 of additional funding to respond to the litany of callousness written by the Reagan administration. An investment in basic human needs now will pay long-range dividends in the future.

The CBC budget would provide $10.2 billion in fiscal year 1985, $10.7 billion in fiscal year 1986, and $11.1 billion in fiscal year 1987. The Census Bureau, the GAO, and now only yesterday, the Congressional Budget Office have confirmed what the CBC and others have been saying: That is, the Reagan budget cuts have hurt the poor. We seek to tell the 34 million Americans living below the poverty level and all of those Americans living at the edge of poverty that this Congress has compassion.

SOCIAL SECURITY AND MEDICARE

This function includes those programs that contribute to the income security and health of aged and disabled Americans through social security and medicare. Programs under social security include old-age and survivors insurance (OASI) and disability insurance (DI). Medicare programs in this function include hospital insurance, supplementary medical insurance, and premiums and collections.

These are the payments to social security trust funds and payments to health care trust funds accounts. The fiscal year 1985 CBC budget requests a total of $20,416,722,000 for these payments, an increase of $2,213,000 over the 1984 appropriation. The largest activity is a $19,020,000 payment to the supplemental medical insurance trust fund. This supports 75 percent of the cost of the medicare part B program as required by Public Law 97-248. The remaining 25 percent is financed by monthly premiums paid by medicare enrollees. In 1984 this premium is $14.60 per month. The CBC budget assumes that this will increase to $16.90 on January 1, 1985. The remaining request of $1.396 billion pays the cost of social security and medicare benefits not supported by payroll taxes. This includes military service credits, Federal employee coverage, and certain very elderly persons whose employment was not covered by social security for a sufficient number of years prior to their retirement.

The President's budget assumes that Congress will enact changes in the medicare program which will reduce the payments to health care trust funds requirement by $806 million.

The CBC budget rejects the President's proposed legislative changes in this function, and provides funding consistent with the CBO current policy baseline.

The CBC budget reflects the belief that the Federal Government has the responsibility to assure a reasonable income and adequate diet for all poor Americans, especially families with children, the elderly and disabled, and the working poor—who, notwithstanding employment—cannot fully provide for themselves.

Finally, the CBC believes that the Federal Government should provide adequate funds to mitigate the loss of income that individuals and their families experience as a result of unemployment, retirement, disability, or death of a wage earner.

AID TO FAMILIES WITH DEPENDENT CHILDREN (AFDC)

The CBC rejects the administration's planned reduction of $633 million for this program, providing a total level of funding of $10.9 billion in budget authority of $3 billion over the CBO baseline.

FOOD AND NUTRITION

The CBC budget provides a total of $15 billion in budget authority for the food stamp program, representing a $4 billion increase over CBO baseline. The CBC budget also restores the school lunch program, the summer feeding program, the special milk program, and all other nutrition programs to their pre-reconciliation funding levels, adjusted for inflation.

LOW-INCOME ENERGY ASSISTANCE

The CBC provides an additional $500 million in aid for low-income energy assistance over the current policy baseline.

UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION

The CBC budget provides an additional $4.5 billion recognizing the continuing high unemployment rates in our cities, over Congressional Budget Office baseline figures for unemployment compensation benefits.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Washington (Mr. LOWRY).

Mr. LOWRY of Washington. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Dixon substitute, the Congressional Black Caucus substitute, and congratulate the author and the Congressional Black Caucus for laying before us a budget alternative that truly reduces the crises level of the Federal deficit.

Now, for 6 months or so everybody has been saying that in an election year Congress is not going to have the courage to pass a budget that does something about the deficit. Well, one good thing about everything that has been going on on this floor for a day, is we are starting to see that there are various alternatives trying to do something about the deficit, but there is one substitute that overwhelmingly does the most about that No. 1 domestic problem we are all supposed to be addressing, the deficit, and that is the Dixon substitute.

The only year that really counts, is the first year, 1985, because every year we write a new budget alternative. The Congressional Black Caucus alternatives in 1985 reduce the deficit $56 billion. It is the only one that even gets close to the mark that the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board was talking about in deficit reduction to for certain have a positive effect on interest rates.

Not that I agree with the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board all the time, but we have all been talking about the $50 billion first year deficit reduction. The Congressional Black Caucus does that.

I have a lot of friends that are concerned about the defense outlay plan in this Congressional Black Caucus plan, and I look at that chart, and I see that this plan calls for a $243 billion expenditure in 1985; $109 billion more than in 1980. An average of 8½ percent real growth per year over those 5 years, that is real growth over inflation. Do we really think we need more than that for security?

Now, I just cannot believe that this is an alternative for the defense budget that weakens this country. It very likely is one that strengthens this country.

Ms. FIEDLER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BURTON).

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, the defense budget, of course, has been the whipping boy of this particular proposal all day long. I would like to put this into perspective. The fact of the matter is in constant dollars, the defense budget has gone down throughout the 1970's. In fact, in 1970, it was $94 billion, and in constant dollars adjusted for inflation, this year will be the first year that it will be back up to $93.9 billion, which is what it was back in 1970.

So when you adjust for inflation, the fact of the matter is the defense outlays have not increased since 1970. Now, as a percentage of national budget, defense during the Kennedy years was 48 percent. By 1970 that had dropped to 39 percent, and in 1983 the percent of the budget allocated for defense was 25.4 percent.

As a comparison, entitlements during the Kennedy years was about 28 percent. They had grown to 32.2 percent by 1970, and in 1983, we had entitlements of 46.7 percent. So, when you are talking about defense and making it the whipping boy, you should put these things into perspective.

The Soviet Union has been spending hundreds of billions of dollars on defense. As a matter of fact, I think in their last fiscal year they spent about $400 billion on defense, and they are developing five new ICBM systems right now. They are expanding their bomber force; they have 190 divisions compared to 29 U.S. divisions, and we ought to put all these things into the proper perspective when we are talking about the defense issues in this particular budget. I think this budget is irresponsible from the standpoint and I hope my colleagues will defeat it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California (Mr. DIXION) has 7 minutes remaining, and the gentlewoman from California (Ms. FIEDLER) has 19 minutes remaining.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, I really only have one or perhaps two other speakers. I do not know if the gentlewoman intends to use her time.

Ms. FIEDLER. I do not, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from California (Mr. DYMALLY).

Mr. DYMALLY. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I bring to the committee my support for the Dixon/Congressional Black Caucus budget substitute, and I urge my colleagues to vote for it. I wish to acknowledge the full cooperation and hard work of all the Congressional Black Caucus members in developing this budget which is built upon the most significant deficit reduction plan before us. I would also like to give special thanks for the superb leadership of the gentleman from California (Mr. DIXON) and the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. GRAY).

Mr. Chairman, the CBC budget substitute in the area of general science, space, and technology supports a reduced Federal budget deficit by holding the total budget authority and outlay levels to the CBC baseline. However, the total now embodies CBC's priorities for science and engineering education in the NASA and NSF budgets. CBC's priorities recognize the need for a stronger Federal role in insuring that our Nation will have the highly skilled and qualified scientists and engineers needed in the future to maintain scientific world leadership and preeminence; the need for the education of scientists and engineers to be maintained at a rate consistent with the proliferation of new advanced technologies in the fields of space and general science and the need for a greater participation of the Federal Government in encouraging the education of minorities and women in the science and engineering disciplines.

These priorities have been incorporated in the NSF budget by reprograming $7.5 million from the science and engineering research programs currently budgeted in the President's proposal. Of this $7.5 million, $1 million has been redirected to minority and women science and engineering programs for faculty research $1.5 million has been directed toward minority graduate fellowships in science and engineering and precollege science and math education, and $5 million has been directed to efforts to improving the research support facilities and equipment in minority institutions. Also, this budget proposes that NASA develops a plan that would encourage space related research at colleges and universities serving a large number of minority students.

I would also like to say a word, Mr. Chairman, about the CBC proposal for international affairs. The members of the CBC take the view that our foreign aid should be directed at building good will through peaceful means. This Congress, this President, this Nation must eventually realize that the people of Central America are fighting against poverty, inadequate education, improper nutrition, and oppressive, mulitaristic government. We have attached the label "Communist" to their efforts and have chosen to oppose their efforts in the name of fighting communism. This justifies our working actively to overthrow the Government in Nicaragua. It justifies ignoring a host of horrible acts that we would not begin to condone if they were to be happening in the United States. Mr. Chairman, the CBC alternative for the international affairs activity does not supply funds to implement the military aid portions of the Kissinger Commission recommendations. It is time that this country returned to its sense of ideals. The CBC budget will help the United States get back to its true values in the area of international affairs.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to conclude my statement by again urging my colleagues to join me in voting for the CBC budget substitute.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, I yield our last 6 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. GRAY), a member of the Committee on the Budget and the chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus task force.

Mr. SAVAGE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAY. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SAVAGE. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I only rise to indicate my support for the Congressional Black Caucus budget because it is the only one of those proposed that makes any sense and shows any priorities different from those of the Reagan administration.

All the other budgets argue over degrees, which one wants to prepare most for war and how quickly, and which one wants to cut the most in domestic programs.

This is the only budget that proposes an absolute cut in our preparations to kill and an absolute increase in our needs to heal, the only budget that makes any sense at all.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Chairman I rise in support of the amendment offered by my colleague, the gentleman from California (Mr. DIXON).

It has become quite clear that the fiscal policies of this administration have had a disastrous impact on the economy of this Nation, and I am afraid that these policies, left unchecked, will, unfortunately, rekindle an economic downturn rivaling only the Great Depression.

It is my belief that last night's vote, on the President's budget reflected a mood shared by both the Members of this body and the Nation as well: That we can ill afford to allow current policies to continue.

In 1964, the first year of Lyndon Johnson's Presidency, the annual deficit totalled a mere $5.9 billion.

This year, as last year, that figure will surpass $180 billion. By the end of 1985, the deficits during the Reagan Presidency will total over $728 billion, more than double the deficits amassed by all previous administrations since the Second World War.

I think we all know the cause of these deficits.

From the beginning, Reagonomics, or what Vice President BUSH once characterized as voodo economics, was an economic theory in conflict with itself.

The combination of strict monetary policy, huge and unnecessary defense expenditures, and massive tax cuts for the most fortunate in our society, could not and did not fulfill the promises made by the President when he first took office.

The administration's latest proposals for fiscal year 1985 are a simple continuation of the President's past failed policies, and is it not ironic, that the same administration which promised not only to balance the budget but to reduce Federal expenditures is the same administration which has increased Federal spending and given us record deficits.

That is why I believe this House rejected the President's budget overwhelmingly last night, and why the American public yearns for a change.

If we are serious about reducing deficits and providing a strong and sustained economic recovery, if we are serious about preforming our Tax Code in a fair and equitable manner, and if we are serious about addressing the problems of our cities, our poor and disadvantaged, there has to be a fundamental change in the priorities of this Nation.

The budget alternative before you now represents that change in priorities, and in my opinion, it is the best plan before us and merits this body's full support.

And let me tell my colleagues why.

First of all, the amendment offered by the gentleman from California provides for the greatest amount of deficit reduction of all the proposals that are going to be considered. In particular, this amendment would reduce the deficit over the next 3 years by $237.9 billion more than the President's original budget; $118.7 billion more than the Latta substitute; and, $142.1 billion more than the House budget committee's plan.

While most of the alternatives continue to support the already massive defense buildup, my colleague from California, Mr. DELLUMS, has made it very clear that this budget provides adequate funding to insure that America stays strong and our security sure—yet doing so in a prudent, rational, and effective fashion.

While most of the alternatives institutionalized this administration's Draconian cuts in essential nondefense discretionary programs—programs aimed at our cities, the disadvantaged, the elderly and the homeless—this budget recognizes that the hungry need to eat, the homeless require shelter and our disadvantaged need a helping hand, even from Government.

The Dixon amendment attempts to address the inequities of our current Tax Code by closing unwarranted and wasteful tax expenditures.

This budget represents the change in fiscal priorities which is needed to restore equity and fairness to our fiscal policies.

I urge each of my colleagues to join in support of the Dixon amendment.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAY. I yield to the gentlewoman from Colorado.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I want to compliment the gentleman from Pennsylvania for his very, very moving statement. I want to join with him in support of this amendment.

I think the gentleman is going right to the heart of what is wrong with America. We see so much of the politics of selfishness. We see so many politicians bragging about all we are doing for all upper middle class people while we have had a 30-percent increase in the number of poor people in the last 3 years. That is a travesty, the results of the politics of selfishness and it is mainly women and children who are suffering.

I compliment the gentleman and I compliment the Black Caucus and the gentleman from California.

Ms. FIEDLER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to this budget, but I think the most important part of this budget is the fact that the Black Caucus has brought to us their special statement and the fact that they feel we are not, through existing Government spending programs, resolving the problems of many of the disadvantaged of this Nation.

I think one of the most important things that we can continue to try to do for the people of the United States is to make certain that they are provided as many opportunities as possible to improve their quality of life, and while we may in fact disagree on the way in which we hope to achieve that, I would like to draw to the attention of the Members the fact that in the last year we have put more than 4 million Americans back to work, people who were on the unemployment rolls due to a closedown of the overall economy, high inflation rates, and high interest rates. The fact that we have been able to bring inflation down has significantly helped the poor a good deal.

During the Carter years inflation ravaged at a rate of 45 percent. It has dropped dramatically. Instead of being an annual rate of 13½ percent, where it was in 1980, it is now down to 3½ or 4 percent. The poor of this Nation during the 4 years of Carter, in spite of the fact that they received cost-of-living increases in welfare programs, food stamps, and other special services, they actually lost 10 percent in their overall spending ability due to inflation.

There was a good deal of discussion today regarding the overall issue of indexing. I would simply like to point out that for many of the women of this Nation who earn an average of $15,000 to $20,000, income tax indexing is expected to save them 14 percent on their overall tax bill. So when we talk in terms of trying to assist those who are at the lower end of the economic ladder, those who have the least to fall back on in the form of discretionary income, indexing is critical.

It is critically important that we make certain that taxes remain at a reasonable level so that people cannot only afford to pay them but can also afford to take care of their families. It is vitally important that we keep inflation low, because inflation eats up the barest amount of discretionary income that those at the lowest levels of the economic ladder have to take care of their families, and it is also important that we keep interest rates down so that we do not expand the overall portion of the pie that the Government takes. The reason for that is that when we get out in the marketplace competing with the private enterprise system for the available money to be lent, what we really do is take jobs away from those people who need them most of all, because we are competing for funds to redistribute at the Government level rather than simply leaving the private sector to reinvest those funds in a way that is going to serve the broadest number of the American people.

Again, Mr. Chairman, I remind the Members of the important achievements we have made. We have brought interest rates down, we have brought inflation down, and we have reemployed over 4 million people. Those policies of the Reagan administration have worked, and I hope this administration will have the opportunity to continue the policies that have been successful in helping to restore economic health to this country.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Congressional Black Caucus amendment. I do so because it is the only budget which recognizes the massive budget cuts inflicted on the poor of this Nation and tries to do something about them.

As the Representative of this Nation's poorest congressional district, where the average income level is less than $3,600 per person and over 41 percent of the families live in poverty, there should be no question why I stand here today to endorse this, the most humane of the budget options before us.

The Congressional Black Caucus offers the House an opportunity to make an investment in our future by increasing elementary and secondary education programs. It increases employment and training assistance while offering hope to the thousands in my city with their names on 8-year-long waiting lists for shelter. To those suffering the pain of poverty, this budget offers hope for food and health assistance.

Yet this proposal also offers the lowest deficit of all the proposals. It does this by eliminating what can only be called offensive and destabilizing weapons such as the MX and Pershing missiles.

This proposal addresses the revenue hemorrhage created by the 1981 tax cut by directing the tax relief provided in that act to the great majority of Americans living on less than the substantial level of $50,000 per year.

Mr. Chairman, we all have heard the story of the individual who comments that he is not paying any taxes this year. When asked if he was unemployed or too poor to pay, this fellow responds: "No, I'm a millionaire." Of all the proposals, this provides the most equitable treatment of our tax laws. Businesses will pay a very fair 15-percent minimum tax.

Over the last 3 years of the Reagan administration, this Nation has seen the ranks of those in poverty grow dramatically. It is time to address this problem. I urge my colleagues to vote in favor of the Congressional Black Caucus budget.

● Mr. TOWNS. Mr. Chairman, I want to endorse the caucus budget's support for community and regional development programs. At a time when our Nation's cities are in need of new infrastructure support and a revitalization of our poor and low-income neighborhoods, the caucus alternative provides funds to support local economic development efforts. In addition to the improvement of the physical structure of our cities, projects funded under this function also create new jobs and a better quality of life.

The Congressional Black Caucus believes that the programs in function 450 serve the vital function of revitalizing areas in which many poor and minority people live as well as stimulating investments that lead to new jobs. The caucus budget would increase the fiscal year 1985 budget figures to $4.5 billion for community development block grants, which is an increase of $1 billion over the administration's request for this program. Our budget would also continue to fund other community services programs at current service levels.

For example, the urban development action grants would be retained at the current CBO funding level of $440 million. I am aware of the importance of the UDAG moneys to local economic development. My own congressional district has just received a $3.6 million UDAG grant to rehabilitate an old abandoned warehouse for an expanding business in the area. This grant will provide over 450 new jobs for women and minorities to economically distressed communities where unemployment is over 15 percent.

To address the urgent national problems of outdated and inefficient manufacturing plants and of deteriorating urban infrastructures of roads, bridges, sewers, and water systems, the new CBC budget includes a new national development bank, with budget authority of $5 billion. This program, which will be established by legislation to be introduced shortly, will offer our cities and manufacturers low-interest loans to help rebuild and upgrade vital public services that are essential to the well-being of urban citizens, American businesses, and the revitalization of America's basic industries.

The caucus recognizes that rural areas also need Federal support to maintain economic viability. Thus, we have retained funding for the Appalachian Regional Commission and other regional development programs at the CBO baseline levels. Finally, our proposal continues the Government's disaster relief programs at their current levels, without the cuts proposed by the administration.

We believe that our budgetary support for community and regional development maintains adequate funding to assist localities, both urban and rural, in their economic development efforts. I hope you will lend your support to this proposal by voting for the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.●

● Mr. CROCKETT. Mr. Chairman, the CBC budget alternative achieves substantial economies in Government spending and addresses the revenue problem in a progressive manner, while at the same time bringing back a sense of fairness, compassion, and responsibility to the activities of the Federal Government.

Today, I should like to call the attention of my colleagues to the international affairs section of the budget alternative. On balance, the foreign affairs budget items reflect our concern for increasing American participation in world affairs in a fashion which is mutually beneficial to members of the world community. We seek to highlight, in this document, the importance of U.S. support to multilateral and bilateral development assistance organizations. It is for this reason that we give particular emphasis to such U.N. programs as the United Nations development program, the United Nations environment program, and UNICEF. Rather than attempting to reduce the effectiveness of these programs and the many others that have provided substantial benefits to the developing world, we should be providing additional support to those programs which have proven themselves effective vehicles for technical assistance and development aid.

The issue of military assistance to foreign governments is given attention in the CBC alternative budget and it specifically calls for the end of military assistance to the governments of Central America. This is a position that I have long held. I oppose all military assistance to any government at any time. As I said recently in dissenting remarks attached to the foreign aid authorization legislation reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

> The provision of U.S. military assistance to foreign governments is not in the long-term interest of either the United States or world peace and cooperation. American military assistance to poor countries, specifically, represents an unconscionable diversion of the world's productive resources into weapons of destruction. Military aircraft, sophisticated missile systems, grenade launchers, and armored personnel carriers are not only inappropriate from the standpoint of economic development, but are morally wrong in a situation where 80 percent of a nation's population is crying out for the barest necessities of food, shelter and clothing.

I think the caucus position on this issue is clear and is an essential part of the general budget debate.

Finally, I should like to comment on an item in the caucus budget alternative which is of particular interest to me. We have proposed a multimillion-dollar program to address one of the principal problems affecting the administration of foreign affairs in the United States, namely, the serious lack of minority Foreign Service personnel. As the United States increasing its involvement in world affairs, there is a clear and urgent need to have a Foreign Service officer core which is truly representative of all the segments of our population.

However, the number of minorities serving in the U.S. Foreign Service remains distressingly low, despite varying levels of past effort to make the Foreign Service more representatives. As of January of this year, statistics show that of the current 3,827 Foreign Service officers and career candidates, only 477 (12 percent) are minorities. The figures for black Americans are even more revealing. Only 6.5 percent of the Foreign Service are black men and women. In the senior levels of the Foreign Service, there are only 11 black Americans. This represents an embarrassing 1.6 percent of the senior level service. And perhaps, even more shocking is the fact that there are no black American women in the senior Foreign Service.

We seek to remedy this situation by increasing the participation of minorities in the Foreign Service. We would do this by establishing several academic programs at regional colleges which would specifically target Foreign Service training for minority Americans. The curriculum followed by the students would center on Foreign Service topics and focus on minority students who have a strong interest in future Foreign Service careers.

The Congressional Black Caucus believes that a far greater effort must be given to improving the effectiveness of the conduct of U.S. foreign affairs. It is in this light that this proposal must be seen.

The black Members of the Congress have repeatedly called upon our colleagues to redirect this country's foreign and domestic policies so as to foster mutual respect and general prosperity. I urge my colleagues to give serious consideration to our constructive, alternative budget.●

● Mr. CLAY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Congressional Black Caucus budget amendment. The CBC budget proposal will reduce the budget deficit by $324 billion by cutting defense spending, eliminating several weapons systems, and reclaiming some of the tax cuts granted to high income households. At the same time, the Congressional Black Caucus budget will increase domestic spending by $97 billion including a $12 billion budget for elementary and secondary education, $2 billion for the Youth Employment Act, $2 billion for the Community Renewal Employment Act, and over

$9 billion for housing and community development programs.

This body has considered a variety of budget plans which range from abominable to dangerous. The Reagan administration produced another plan which calls on the working citizen to sacrifice, and most of the proposals before us today reflect some version of this nearsighted strategy. Continuing the massive military buildup and tax advantages for the wealthy will benefit only a few and shows no commitment to our future. Most of the proposals before us are a disgrace to honest-working citizens and a death threat to the sick, hungry, and homeless. Efforts to increase military spending or make cosmetic cuts in the defense budget reflect irresponsible and reckless Government and should not even be the subject of our debate. The United States already leads the world in spending for military defense while our Nation ranks 17th for its ability to keep infants alive in the first year of life. Every week, over 200 American children die from poor health care and malnutrition. Yet, there are those arguing to increase our defense expenditures and reduce our domestic spending.

Our Nation has the military capacity to destroy the planet Earth and still most of us are calling for more military might. The Congressional Black Caucus' budget proposal is the only constructive budget plan under consideration. It is the only plan which offers help to the millions of Americans who have fallen into poverty since President Reagan took office and provides an opportunity to revive the spirit and strength of the waning middle class. These objectives cannot be achieved unless we halt military spending and reorder our priorities.

I encourage my colleagues to reconsider our Nation's military buildup. As General Eisenhower explained it 21 years ago:

Every gun that is made, every warship launched, every rocket fired signifies a theft from those who hunger and are not fed, those who are cold and are not clothed. This world in arms is not spending money alone. It is spending the sweat of its laborers, the genius of its scientists, the hope of its children.●

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. DIXON).

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. Hawkins for, with Mr. Ray against.

Mr. Rangel for, with Mr. Shelby against.

Mr. MARKEY changed his vote from "no" to "aye."

So the amendment in the nature of a substitute was rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. OLIN. Mr. Chairman, I was unfortunately detained on official business and missed the last rollcall vote, rollcall No. 70.

Had I been present, I would have voted "no."

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. SYNAR. Mr. Chairman, I was detained on official business and was unable to vote on rollcall No. 70, the Congressional Black Caucus amendment. I would have voted "no."

SEC. 2. (a) Not later than May 1, 1984, the House committees named in subsections (b) through (i)(1) of this section shall submit their recommendations to the House Budget Committee. After receiving those recommendations, the Committee on the Budget shall report to the House a reconciliation bill or resolution or both carrying out all such recommendations without any substantive revision.

(b) The House Committee on Agriculture shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority by $50,000,000 and outlays by $50,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of budget authority by $800,000,000 and outlays by $800,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of budget authority by $1,700,000,000 and outlays by $1,700,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(c) The House Committee on Armed Services shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce outlays by $300,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of outlays by $650,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of outlays by $1,000,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(d) The House Committee on Education and Labor shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce outlays by $150,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of outlays by $150,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of outlays by $200,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(e) The House Committee on Energy and Commerce shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority by $1,000,000,000 and outlays by $1,000,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of budget authority by $1,350,000,000 and outlays by $1,350,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of budget authority by $1,650,000,000 and outlays by $1,650,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(f) The House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce outlays by $550,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of outlays by $1,300,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of outlays by $1,800,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(g) The House Committee on Small Business shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee sufficient to reduce outlays by $200,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of $150,000,000 in budget authority and $200,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of $250,000,000 in budget authority and $200,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1987.

(h) The House Committee on Veterans' Affairs shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority by $150,000,000 and outlays by $400,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of budget authority by $50,000,000 and outlays by $250,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of budget authority by $250,000,000 and outlays by $250,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(i)(1) The House Committee on Ways and Means shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority by $1,000,000,000 and outlays by $1,000,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of budget authority by $1,400,000,000 and outlays by $1,400,000,000 in fiscal yer 1986; and requires decreases of budget authority by $1,750,000,000 and outlays by $1,750,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(2) The House Committee on Ways and Means shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee sufficient to increase revenues by $14,300,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires increases of $27,300,000,000 in revenues in fiscal year 1986; and requires increases of $34,600,000,000 in revenues in fiscal year 1987.

GENERAL PROVISIONS

SEC. 3. (a) For fiscal years 1985, 1986, and 1987, any revenues raised by legislation enacted on or after March 15, 1984, shall only be used to reduce the Federal budget deficits for such fiscal years except to the extent that such legislation earmarks all or any part of such revenues for specific spending programs.

(b) Pursuant to subsection (a) of this section and notwithstanding the spending levels contained in section 1 of this resolution, funding for specific low-income programs, such as—

(1) an employment initiative for disadvantaged youth;

(2) public works jobs for community renewal;

(3) increased funding for the Aid to Families with Dependent Children program and the State component of the Supplemental Security Income program to ensure that the purchasing power of recipients is maintained;

(4) increased funding for title XX of the Social Security Act; and

(5) an increase in the earned income tax credit; would be appropriate if the authorizations for such programs are enacted and if sufficient revenues or outlay reductions are also enacted to ensure that the legislation is deficit neutral.

ADMINISTRATIVE SAVINGS

SEC. 4. It is the sense of the Congress that the Executive Branch achieve at least $2 billion in savings over fiscal years 1985 through 1987 by implementing those recommendations of the President's Private Sector Survey on Cost Control requiring administrative action within that branch of Government. It is further the sense of the Congress that the President shall report to Congress each year, in conjunction with the annual budget submission, on the progress made in achieving the savings required by this section.

AUTOMATIC SECOND BUDGET RESOLUTION

SEC. 5. (a) If Congress has not completed action by October 1, 1984, on the concurrent resolution on the budget required to be reported under section 310(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 for the 1985 fiscal year, then this concurrent resolution shall be deemed to be the concurrent resolution required to be reported under section 310(a) of such Act, for the purposes of the prohibitions contained in section 311 of such Act, notwithstanding congressional action or inaction on any reconciliation requirements contained in this concurrent resolution.

(b) Section 311(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, as made applicable by subsection (a) of this section, shall not apply to bills, resolutions, or amendments within the jurisdiction of a committee, or any conference report on any such bill or resolution, if—

(1) the enactment of such bill or resolution as reported;

(2) the adoption and enactment of such amendment; or

(3) the enactment of such bill or resolution in the form recommended in such conference report;

would not cause the appropriate allocation for such committee of new discretionary budget authority or new spending authority as described in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 made pursuant to section 302(a) of such Act for fiscal year 1985 to be exceeded.

(c) The provisions of this section shall cease to apply when Congress completes action on a subsequent concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1985 pursuant to section 304 or 310 of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974.

"PAY AS YOU GO" TRUST FUND AMENDMENT

SEC. 6. (a) For purposes of the spending levels for fiscal year 1985 contained in section 1 of this resolution, and the assumptions upon which they are based, and for purposes of determining whether or not a committee exceeds its section 302(a) allocation of new discretionary budget authority or new spending authority for the prohibition contained in section 5 of this resolution, any new discretionary budget authority or new spending authority contained in a bill, resolution, amendment, or conference report shall be disregarded if the budget authority for outlays which will result from such new discretionary budget authority or such new spending authority is derived from any trust fund—

(1) the expenditures from which are available for highway, mass transit, or aviation purposes;

(2) for which new or expanded user fees or taxes were enacted during the 97th Congress; and

(3) which is described in section 401(d)(1)(B) of the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Act of 1974.

(b) For purposes of the spending levels for fiscal year 1985 contained in section 1 of this resolution, and the assumptions upon which they are based, and for purposes of determining whether or not a committee exceeds its seciton 302(a) allocation of new discretionary budget authority or new spending authority for the prohibition contained in section 5 of this resolution, any new discretionary budget authority contained in a bill, resolution, amendment, or conference report to fund programs under the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act of 1980 shall be disregarded to the extent that such bill, resolution, amendment, or conference report contains revenue sufficient to cover such new spending, or to the extent that sufficient revenue to cover such increases is included in the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation and Liability Act of 1980.

SECTION 302(b) FILING REQUIREMENT

SEC. 7. (a) It shall not be in order in the House of Representatives to consider any bill or resolution, or amendment thereto, providing—

(1) new budget authority for fiscal year 1985;

(2) new spending authority described in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act first effective in fiscal year 1985; or

(3) direct loan authority, primary loan guarantee authority, or secondary loan guarantee authority for fiscal year 1985;

within the jurisdiction of any committee which has received an allocation pursuant to section 302(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of discretionary budget authority or new spending authority, as described above, for such fiscal year, unless and until such committee makes the allocation or subdivisions required by section 302(b) of the Congressional Budget Act, in connection with the most recently agreed to concurrent resolution on the budget.

(b) The prohibition contained in subsection (a) shall not apply until twenty-one days of continuous session, as defined in section 1011(5) of the Impoundment Control Act of 1974, after Congress completes action on this concurrent resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to House Resolution 476, the amendment is considered as having been read.

The gentleman from New York (Mr. MCHUGH) will be recognized for 30 minutes, and a Member opposed will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from New York (Mr. MCHUGH).

Mr. MCHUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 7 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, the substitute which I am offering would reduce budget deficits more than any other budget proposal now pending. More specifically, over the next 3 years this substitute would reduce budget deficits by a total of $262 billion. That is $28 billion more than the deficit reduction in the MacKay substitute; it is $57 billion more in deficit reduction than in the Latta substitute; and it is $80 billion more in deficit reduction than contained in the committee resolution.

In short, Mr. Chairman, this resolution offers us the best opportunity to take a significant step in reducing budget deficits. And make no mistake about it, that is the standard by which our action today will be judged. Deficits, as we all know, are the greatest threat to our economy and to our security, and we must act today to reduce those deficits significantly.

However, I agree with the chairman of the Budget Committee, the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. JONES), when he says that whatever we do with respect to a budget resolution must be realistic. Whatever budget resolution we adopt must be implemented. I would submit, Mr. Chairman, that the substitute which I am now offering is realistic and, therefore, can be implemented.

Let us consider the specific parts. First of all, with regard to nondefense spending, this substitute incorporates the very same figures as are included in the Budget Committee resolution. This means that over the next 3 years nondefense spending will rise at a rate which is less than inflation; it will rise at a rate which is about $16 billion less than inflation.

Certain important programs will experience real growth at the rate of 3.5 percent. Those programs are targeted to the very poor and the handicapped, and I think it is important that they experience some real growth. But overall, nondefense spending will rise at a lower rate than inflation.

We all have our favorite domestic spending programs. I do, and I am sure you do. But if we are really serious about the deficit, if we really believe it is a major threat to our economy we must be restrained with programs we like.

What is true for nondefense spending is also true for military spending. For that reason this substitute would hold defense spending over the next 3 years to an inflation adjustment only. That would mean approximately $75 billion more to adjust for inflation over 3 years, but no more.

Underlying this proposal are two basic premises. The first is that military expenditures have increased at a rather dramatic rate over the last 3 years. More specifically, in fiscal year 1980, budget authority for military expenditures was $146 billion. Today, in fiscal year 1984, budget authority for military expenditures is $269 billion, an increase in 3 years of $123 billion.

In my judgment, and I suspect in the judgment of many others here and outside this Chamber, the Pentagon has been unable to absorb that substantial increase efficiently and, therefore, I think it is responsible to hold down further real increases in the interest of reducing the deficits.

The second premise underlying our defense figure is the knowledge that the Senate will surely pass a budget resolution which has a real increase for defense of approximately 8 percent.

We should anticipate the compromises that will necessarily take place in conference. One of those compromises will involve an increase in defense above the House figure. We all know that, and therefore, to the extent that we want defense to make a reasonable contribution to deficit reduction, this substitute is realistic.

Finally, with respect to revenues, we also believe we have a realistic approach.

This substitute assumes that over the next 3 years we will raise $76 billion in new revenue. This is only $27 billion more than the Budget Committee assumes. It would be raised over 3 years and it would all go to reducing the deficit.

Is this unrealistic? Is it asking too much? In answering that question, I would ask you to consider that as a result of the tax legislation Congress has passed in the last 3 years, the Treasury will not collect approximately $490 billion in revenue. If you wonder why we have a major deficit problem, this is a significant reason. All we are asking in this substitute is to recapture $76 billion of that $490 billion to reduce the deficit. We think that is a modest step to take to help assume our national economic health.

And by the way, that $76 billion is about what it would take to keep defense even with inflation.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I believe we are presenting today a reasonable, responsible, realistic budget resolution and I urge my colleagues to vote for it, primarily because it will deal in a meaningful way with the reduction of deficits which represent one of the most serious threats facing our country today.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATTA) rise?

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATTA) is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. McHUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. PEASE).

Mr. PEASE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the McHugh substitute. I have just come from hearings in the Trade Subcommittee where we heard the chief executive officers of four major American corporations talking about the problem of trade deficits. Our merchandise trade deficit was $69 billion last year. The estimates are that it will go up to $125 billion this year. These corporate officers told us that that will have a devastating effect on our economy. The one concrete step which they told us we could take to reverse this trend is to reduce Federal deficits.

I believe that with the McHUGH substitute we have a realistic opportunity to do that. The McHugh substitute balances the sacrifice between defense spending and domestic spending. It does not ask for a disproportionate share from either side.

In addition to that, the McHugh substitute provides for $76 billion in revenue over the next 3 years, which, as the gentleman from New York (Mr. McHUGH) has pointed out, surely is not an excessive amount when you consider that the 1981 tax bill alone will result in a loss of revenue of some $490 billion over the same period of time.

We all know that we are going to have to take a three-pronged approach; cutting back on domestic spending, restricting the growth of defense spending and increasing revenue if we are to get the deficits under control.

The chief executive officers with whom we talked this morning emphasized that we do not have much time; we must get the deficit down as soon as possible. The McHugh substitute gives us the best opportunity.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. PEASE) has expired.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. PEASE), if he needs it.

The gentleman does not need any more time?

Mr. PEASE. No; I do not, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. LATTA.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I reserve my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATTA) reserves his time.

Mr. McHUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. VENTO).

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the McHugh substitute.

Mr. Chairman, I would just like to say I think this is the most creative initiative we have before us. I want to first of all give credit where credit is due, to the Budget Committee in terms of the work they have done in terms of domestic spending, because this proposal tracks that proposal for a 3-year change in domestic spending. Many of the proposals have been legislative initiatives that have passed and realistically we are taking them into consideration with this particular substitute.

But additionally, this substitute addresses the other issues more effectively in terms of dealing with other problems on fiscal policy; namely, the issue of defense spending and the issue of taxes.

The tax dollars that are gained in this particular measure is dedicated to the reduction of the deficit.

Mr. Chairman, I think for too long we have been measuring defense spending with a 13-inch ruler and measuring domestic spending with an 11-inch ruler. I think it is high time we began to face up to this. Because if we do not face the crunch right now in this year with regard to defense spending, it is simply going to be compounded in the future years.

So I think it is time to address runaway military spending and place realistic limits on the tremendous increases of the past 4 years. This measure keeps military spending exactly where it is today with the adjustments provided for only inflation.

Frankly, I think that that is adequate. All too often the bargaining chips have become weapons in the field, and some day like almost all military weapons the real possibility exists for their use.

Today as we focus on the budget issue this measure provides the greatest reduction of any of the remaining budget measures to be considered it means that we began today not after the November elections, but today facing up to the reality of taxes and spending. I urge my colleagues support.

Mr. McHUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. McKINNEY).

Mr. McKINNEY. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that even though politics as usual is part of the structure of this House, and it seems to be where we are coming from, once again, particularly with the antics yesterday on the original Reagan budget. The politics as usual is not what is going on in the Fourth Congressional District of the State of Connecticut.

My people are tired of budget deficits, they are tired of an overrated American dollar because of these deficits and high interest rates, which is robbing Americans of jobs, trade, and opportunity; they are tired of not being able to buy a house; and they are tired of paying too much for a car.

In essense, they are tired of Congress not facing up to its responsibilities.

I consider myself a good Republican, though some might argue that point. And I stand full square behind the McHugh substitute and full square behind, if that does not pass, the MacKay substitue; as the only two realistic documents that have appeared in front of this body since the beginning of this debate.

First off, some of you are going to use the excuse that we have decimated the Defense Department. Gentlemen and ladies, please, the Pentagon has had a 41-percent increase in real spending power over the last 3 years.

The Pentagon, ladies and gentlemen, is awash in appropriated, unexpended funds. The Pentagon is, in fact, refusing, time after time, to set the priorities for the strategic and tactical defense of the United States of America.

And I would suggest to you that we have increased the Pentagon's budget; we have increased it to inflation and that if the Pentagon would follow the recommendations of the Grace Commission report, if they would, in fact, turn back those funds appropriated and nonexpended on programs, the Pentagon could in fact, share its obligation to help make this country work.

Now when we get to the social programs—and we have done a job on them. It is not right to take away the money from those people in this country that have no constituency or no voice. Well, Mr. Chairman, I refuse to join that cabal.

We cannot balance the budget of the United States of America on 10 percent of its expenditures. It used to be 14 percent, we have managed to get rid of 4.

It is about time we spread the load.

If, in fact, you are interested in reducing the deficit of the United States of America, the McHugh budget and the MacKay budget are the two that will do it. They are fair to social programs, they keep them frozen at a fair level, where possible. They are fair to the Defense Department and they are fair in the taxation area. Tax those more that can afford it.

They recognize that we as a political body have refused to face the real issues and that we will not do it until this political hailstorm is over in 1984. One real issue, I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, is non-need-related entitlements; Another real issue is responsibility on the part of the Department of Defense, of which they have shown none. They are in the toy store buying the toys and they do not know if they will work. While they cannot supply a shell to the Connecticut National Guard at Fort Drum, while they cannot put a rocket on their new destroyers. While we are back in a condition, as a practical operating condition, that we were in at the start of World War II. When they sent out soldiers out to drill with broomsticks.

We have, in fact, in the McHugh budget a realistic call to action by the Defense Department, a realistic freeze of social programs, a realistic tax increase. But far more important, Mr. Chairman, let me warn all the Members of one thing; 3 years' projections. We cannot project in this place for 6 months.

I remember sitting on the Banking Committee. We had all the experts in the United States of America tell us what was going to happen with new instruments for the banks, new financial instruments.

We said $50 billion in a year. We ended up with over $260 billion in a year.

We cannot predict. So do not get caught in the trap of the illusions. McHugh, MacKay handle the present and give us the opportunity to display some courage, which is a short commodity around here sometimes.

Mr. McHUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. SEIBERLING).

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, I wish to associate myself with the remarks of the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. McKINNEY), the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. PEASE), and the gentleman from New York (Mr. McHUGH), and I rise in support of the McHugh amendment.

Mr. Chairman, The most urgent problem facing our country is bringing under some semblance of control the enormous, unbelievable Reaganomics-caused Federal deficit. As a result of the ill advised Reagan tax cuts adopted in 1981, we are borrowing billions to provide tax breaks for the wealthy, cutting the "safety net" for the poor, the elderly, and the disabled in order to subsidize the extravaganzas of the Pentagon, and wiping out jobs for millions of Americans so that the President can get through the election before facing up to this unpleasant responsibility of cleaning up the disastrous economic consequences of his tax and military policies.

The McHugh amendment is a realistic, responsible, humane effort to face up to these problems now and not after the election.

Mr. McHUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. LEVIN).

Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the McHugh amendment for two reasons. No. 1, it is the only budget proposal that has a real chance of a larger budget deficit reduction than the inadequate amount of reduction in the President's. The final figure on defense and in programs like social security disability would eat up the difference above the President's that is provided in any other plan, or at least most of it. This plan provides added revenue as well as major expenditure cuts so that we would end up with more of a deficit reduction. It is critical that we dramatically lower the deficit and do it this year, not next.

And second, it is fair. It is fair on the revenue side, it is fair on the program side. When it comes to cutting the budget, justice is not blind. If we must use an ax, and I think we are going to have to, at least it ought to be able to distinguish between what is fair and what is unfair. This is the proposal that best does it.

I strongly urge that on both sides of the aisle we join together in support of the McHugh amendment.

Mr. McHUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Washington (Mr. LOWRY).

Mr. LOWRY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the McHugh amendment.

Of the remaining alternatives this is the greatest opportunity to keep faith with what we all said was our primary objective in this budget process, to reduce the budget deficit. Also, I would like to agree with our excellent colleague from Connecticut (Mr. McKINNEY), who also pointed out it is the first year, 1985, that really counts in this budget process, because every year we write a new 3-year budget.

The DSG-McHugh substitute reduces the deficit $41.7 billion in 1985. More than any remaining budget alternative.

Second, I would like to say and especially to the new Members who are concerned if the revenue figure in the McHugh substitute is realistic.

There is a commitment that when the Ways and Means bill comes onto the floor next Wednesday, if the budget resolution makes room for an additional $27 to $29 billion of revenue, that an amendment to raise that revenue will be offered. It will not be a replay of last year when Ways and Means did not present to the floor the opportunity to vote for the revenue base that was called for in the budget resolution. It will happen next Wednesday. If you have the courage today to vote for the substitute that gives the greatest opportunity to reduce the deficit, next Wednesday you will have the opportunity for the tax package to back that up.

I strongly encourage voting for this opportunity to reduce the deficit, the McHugh substitute.

Mr. McHUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentlewoman from Ohio (Ms. KAPTUR).

Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the McHugh budget substitute. Members from both sides of the aisle have rightly taken to the floor to discuss the dangers which the deficit poses. We know it threatens to strangle the economic recovery now underway. We know it threatens to foreclose the chances of sustained economic growth through the rest of this decade. Moreover, we know that it irresponsibly mortgages our children's future.

The McHugh substitute deserves the support of all Members who are serious about reducing the deficit and reducing it in the fairest, most equitable way. First, the McHugh substitute cuts deficits by a larger amount than any of the remaining budget options. Deficits would be cut by $262 billion over the next 3 years. This is $100 billion more than would be cut by the administration's latest proposal.

Spending reductions would come from an across-the-board freeze at the current services level. This proposal guarantees the same level of services currently available including defense—no more, no less. Only slight adjustments would be made in funding for legitimate safety net programs including child nutrition, job training and compensatory education to serve low- and middle-income individuals have suffered disproportionately in recent years. We know this administration has cut basic needs programs drastically and the ravages of the recession have taken a toll. It is only fair that some small restoration in funding for means-tested human needs programs be accepted.

Finally, the McHugh substitute would raise revenues by $27 billion more than the remaining proposals and revenues would go to offset the deficit.

Most of the Reagan tax giveaways total $490 billion over the next 3 years. The McHugh proposal only suggests recovering 15-percent of the lost revenue in order to restore some fairness to our tax code. Less than one-third of the total deficit reduction package would be composed of added revenues.

The approach suggested under the McHugh amendment is a fair one. For example, we know last year, corporations received more in tax breaks than they paid in taxes. The McHugh amendment suggests a revenue approach that emphasizes eliminating particularly unfair tax breaks.

It is likely as much as one-third of the revenue could be generated by a 15-percent alternative minimum tax on corporations. The Reagan administration made an identical proposal 2 years ago. This provision would correct the unevenness in the tax system which has the telecommunications industry paying an effective tax rate of 1.6-percent while the rubber industry's effective rate was 39-percent.

Clearly, the McHugh substitute offers the most balanced program to reduce the deficit. The burden of spending cuts would be shared equally. Revenues would be raised by a reasonable amount and in an equitable manner. Most importantly, deficits would be cut dramatically. Thus, we would take a significant step toward a sustainable economic recovery. Let us pass this substitute. It is time to act.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 2 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I think it is well to point out that this substitute also would reduce our defense effort by $140.4 billion over 3 years. Even the substitute reported out by our committee would only reduce the defense effort by $95 billion, which is about $55 billion more than our substitute.

This budget would also increase taxes much more than the amount reported out by the House Ways and Means Committee. It would increase taxes to the tune of $76.2 billion. And we have not yet heard an explanation as to how they are going to raise that additional revenue.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LATTA. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Again, I want to call attention of the Members to what is in this substitute package. I might point out that my attraction to a freeze is one that I have publicly stated all this calendar year as we have been putting this budget together.

Let me repeat, I want the Members to know what they are voting on today because they will have to start implementing that plan next week.

There are two very key features in this substitute that I want to call to the attention of the Members.

First, there is no real growth at all in military expenditures. All military expenditures will be held to nothing greater than the rate of inflation.

□ 1320

The second factor concerns taxes. When the tax bill comes before the floor next week, the Members will be asked not only to vote for the $47 billion-plus tax bill out of the Ways and Means Committee, but also for the Pease substitute which will raise another $28 billion in a number of items.

Mr. LATTA. May I ask the chairman a question, since he serves on the Ways and Means Committee and is familiar with this Pease substitute? What kind of tax increases? What are we talking about specifically in the Pease substitute?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore (Mr. VENTO). The time of the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATTA) has expired.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1 additional minute.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. The author of the amendment may want to respond to this question, but among the items in the Pease substitute is an alternative minimum corporate tax, raising $10.5 billion; a full basis adjustment for the investment tax credit, raising another $4.7 billion; and increasing the depreciation lives on structures from 15 to 20 years, raising another $4.1 billion.

Mr. LATTA. If the gentleman will yield there, does the gentleman mean real estate, if you buy real estate?

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Under the accelerated cost recovery or ACR, the present structure life is 15 years for depreciation purposes. This would be extended to 20 years under the Pease amendment.

The foreign corporate income tax provisions would raise $2.2 billion; limitation on individual nonbusiness nonmortgage interest deductions would raise $2.7 billion.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATTA) has again expired.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself an additional 1 minute.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. And a luxury excise tax, $1.2 billion more.

There are many components in the Pease substitute that I think deserve our attention and deserve our support. But if this substitute were to pass, it assumes that all of the Pease amendment would be a part of that, and those who vote for the substitute this week would have to vote for that particular tax provision next week.

I only point this out again to keep the House honest on the kind of budget we are voting on this year. If we are going to support a freeze substitute, then let use be fully prepared in the next few weeks to vote no increase above inflation for military and to add another $28 billion in tax increases that will be coming before the floor next week.

Mr. McHUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. BEDELL).

Mr. McHUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. ROSE).

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Chairman, you know, I am glad that Mr. BUDDY ROEMER is here so he can hear what I have to say. There were some of us who were sitting around talking in the last few days about what the ideal budget resolution would look like so far as the message that it would send to the American people. Before I say that, I want to compliment the chairman of the Budget Committee, JIM JONES, for the great job that he has done, and the hard work that he has gone through as he has been pulled and pushed from every direction to come up with what the Budget Committee will present later today. But I felt that the DSG budget approach would provide us with an opportunity to send a real strong message to the country, to the world, to the financial institutions not only of America but all over this globe.

I would probably prefer to be able to take part of BUDDY ROEMER's budget, what he did with the entitlements, and then take out of the DSG approach what it does to defense, and then leave social security alone and come up with something somewhere between, if you will, the DSG and the CDF approach. But hindsight is always 20/20. Here we are today, with the McHugh approach, which I support and totally endorse and ask my colleagues to strongly consider for many, many reasons, but the greatest reason is the deficit reduction.

I absolutely am getting some of the most frightening letters that I have gotten in my six terms in this House from constituents in my district who are beginning to realize what is going to happen to us in 1985.

I have a very enlightened constituent who has made a lot of money and who was recently in Switzerland talking to the chief executive officer of one of the largest banks in Switzerland. A bank executive told my constituent, "We have got about $700 billion of foreign currencies invested in the United States and we are watching you fellows daily carefully to see what you are doing with that deficit. We believe you are probably going to monetize it sometime in the next several quarters, and when you start printing more money we are coming out of America as fast as we can, and you are going to be looking at 25 percent interest rates in 1985."

Now, my homebuilders are already nervous. The banks generally are jittery. Have you been out into the market lately and tried to negotiate a mortgage on a new home? Well, I have had that experience, and I can tell you it is frightening to look into 1985 and see what the markets are projecting for this country.

The McHugh-DSG approach to the Federal budget promises us the largest deficit reduction second only to the one the Congressional Black Caucus presented here earlier.

My friends, I am not afraid to freeze defense spending at inflation for the next 3 years. We are in 1984 and the sky has not fallen, the Russians have not moved across the Potomac.

Go up to the Intelligence Committee and ask to see the budget request of the intelligence community for 1985.

I urge my colleagues to support the McHugh substitute.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL).

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, we have voted on a number of similar budgets. We have had them described to us. I would simply like to describe this budget version so that Members who might be listening would have a chance to make their decisions based on what I see are the differences between the major choices.

In the first place, this budget relies on $26 billion more in taxes than the committee's budget and about $28 billion more in the Latta Republican substitute. In fact, it would require $4.5 billion more in taxes in the first fiscal year, $10 billion more in taxes in the second year, and $12 billion in the third fiscal year. That is a pretty heavy new tax load.

My judgment is that there is not a heavy ground swell out in our constituencies for increased taxes. As a matter of fact, most of the polls that I read and people that I talk to tell me that folks are looking for reductions in expenditures and not increases in taxation.

The other principal place from which this budget achieves a substantial reduction in the total deficit is in defense where it spends $45 billion less than the committee budget.

In my judgment, defense needs to get the same scrutiny and make the same sacrifice as every element in the budget. However, I doubt that there are any of the Members, even the proponents of this budget, who believe that the figure that they are presenting is rational or achievable.

□ 1330

Therefore, one must look at the $261 billion deficit reduction and say, hey, wait a minute, there is some phoniness here, it is not going to work, and if we are going to reach this desirable deficit number, cuts are going to have to be made elsewhere.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield to the distinguished ranking member of the Budget Committee.

Mr. LATTA. I want to thank the gentleman for yielding, and since he is on the Ways and Means Committee as well as being on the Budget Committee, I would like to ask him something about this Pease tax package.

I have been just handed a sheet that says that part of that tax package would deal with a limitation in interest deductions on your income taxes. Since we want to get the real estate business going again, especially in Ohio, will the gentleman explain to us what he is talking about?

Mr. FRENZEL. I really cannot. I would have to refer you to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. PEASE) to whom I now yield to explain that interesting feature of this tax program.

Mr. PEASE. I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I would like to assure the gentleman and all the Members of the House that this provision has nothing whatsoever to do with home mortgage interest; it applies to consumer interest only. It would still allow people to deduct for consumer interest $4,000 on a joint return, which means that they could have about $40,000 in outstanding borrowings.

We think that that is quite a generous limitation, but I would emphasize again it does not affect housing in any way.

Mr. FRENZEL. I thank the gentleman and I yield to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATTA).

Mr. LATTA. Apparently this handout sheet has provision A, which says provisions primarily affecting business taxpayers, and B, provisions primarily affecting nonbusiness taxpayers, and listed under the nonbusiness taxpayers is a limitation on interest deductions.

Is the gentleman now saying that his amendment would not affect nonbusiness taxpayers?

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. PEASE).

Mr. PEASE. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

No; what I said was is that it does not affect housing mortgage interest. It does affect consumer interest; that is, if a person goes out and borrows $25,000 to buy an automobile, he gets to deduct that interest from his income tax.

Mr. FRENZEL. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Does it cap personal business expenditures for individuals? Interest expenditures?

Mr. PEASE. Nonhousing interest, yes.

Mr. FRENZEL. So if I were a small business person I could still only deduct, and operating as an individual entrepreneur, I could not deduct more than $4,000?

Mr. PEASE. That is correct.

Mr. FRENZEL. I thank the gentleman and the other gentleman from Ohio will certainly have a statement on that.

Mr. LATTA. Let me ask the gentleman for one other clarification since he has the time.

There was some rumor that there was going to be a tax on automobiles costing more than $20,000. I wonder if that is still in this Pease-Gephardt-Moody-McHugh amendment?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL) has expired.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 more minute to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield further to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. PEASE) for his answer.

Mr. PEASE. The luxury tax portion would tax at the rate of 10 percent that portion of the value of an automobile which exceeded $20,000. In other words, if you bought a $21,000 car, you would pay the tax on $1,000.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 more minute to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL).

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, we have had an interesting but brief discussion of some of the tax problems of achieving increased income taxes. I doubt that the small business people of the United States, most of whom operate as individuals, will enjoy having a ceiling placed on what has been customarily a business deduction and which is a real expense of doing business in a high-interest economy such as that in which we live.

This bill, this proposition, derives money its savings from more taxes, and considerably less defense. In my judgment the savings that it seeks to achieve are unachievable; would not be voted by this House, and therefore it deserves to be defeated.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LATTA. Let me ask you whether or not since you serve on the Ways and Means Committee this proposition has been considered by the Ways and Means Committee; if it has, has it been reported?

Mr. FRENZEL. I have not seen it, we have had no hearings on it, and I know nothing about it other than what we have described today.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL) has expired.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. PEASE).

Mr. PEASE. I appreciate the gentleman yielding and I would like to correct myself in one respect. The consumer interest provision would apply to nonbusiness interest. So, therefore, it would not affect the normal small business operations who are operating as individual proprietorships.

Mr. FRENZEL. That would be very helpful and I thank the gentleman. It is also a good reason why we ought to have hearings and a committee record so we know what we are voting on before we put it into the budget.

Mr. PEASE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. PEASE. I appreciate the gentleman yielding.

He understands of course that we are not voting on a tax provision today; we are making room in the budget for $29 billion in revenue. If this substitute is adopted and I hope it will be, it will be on the floor next week or the week after. We will have ample opportunity to discuss the specifics of each of these proposals.

Mr. FRENZEL. I understand that. As far as I know the gentleman from Ohio is the only one who has been bold enough to suggest where the extra burdens on the taxpayers may fall.

Mr. McHUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. MOODY).

Mr. MOODY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

We were asked a minute ago, Where is the groundswell for raising taxes? There definitely is a groundswell for reducing the deficit. And let us be realistic, we are only going to cut spending so much, particularly when the budget comes back from the Senate. When it does, we are not going to be cutting military so much. The only way to really cut the deficit is to work seriously on the revenue side.

But does this amendment really entail a tax increase? I would maintain that it does not. In fact, it is a revenue restoration measure. If you look at the revenues which were lost since 1981 as a result of the TEFRA and ERTA tax bills, up to the present it adds up to $125 billion. So we are proposing with this amendment to add an additional increment of $29 billion back to revenues.

Over the forward period of 1985 to 1987, which is the 3-year period we are now looking at, there will be additional revenue loss of $448 billion as a result of the tax changes enacted in 1981 and 1982. If you look at the 3-year figure of $29 billion in that respect, it is actually a very tiny, tiny part of the revenue restoration which we so badly need.

There is a groundswell for deficit reduction. The additional revenues called for in the McHugh amendment are badly needed and are the only realistic way to obtain necessary deficit reductions.

Mr. McHUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. MORRISON).

Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, the plan proposed by the Democratic Study Group (DSG) is the best budget the House will consider because it contains real deficit reduction with a reasonable balance of priorities between defense and social spending.

I want to commend my colleague from Connecticut on the minority side, Mr. McKINNEY, for his eloquent statement in support of this plan. The plan would hold spending increases below the rate of inflation for all programs except for social security, defense, and means-tested entitlements, which would all get a full inflationary increase. In addition, the plan provides targeted increases for selected programs to help the needy.

Overall, the plan cuts $16 billion from domestic programs and maintains a reasonable level of growth in defense spending, which would increase by 18.7 percent over the next 3 years.

The DSG plan will cut the deficit to $165 billion in fiscal year 1985, $146 billion in fiscal year 1986, and $139 billion in fiscal year 1987.

In contrast, President Reagan in February proposed a budget that would have produced $636 billion more in deficit spending over the 3-year period. In fiscal year 1987, the deficit under the President's budget would have been $229 billion—$90 billion more than the deficit spending that would have been required in that fiscal year under the DSG plan.

Since that time, the President has endorsed a budget compromise with Senate Republicans that is only marginally better in terms of projected deficits. The President's new plan would require $563 in deficit spending over 3 years, including $198 billion in fiscal year 1987, $59 billion more than the DSG proposal.

The truth is that compared with the $189 billion projected deficit for the current budget year, fiscal year 1984, the President's first and second plans do not accomplish anything toward cutting the deficit.

Unlike the Reagan plans, the DSG proposal would lower the annual deficits below this year's $189 billion figure in each of the next 3 budget years and is fully $50 billion lower in fiscal year 1987.

You may recall that the President has claimed his second plan will reduce the deficit by $149 billion over 3 years. How is it possible that the President can reduce the deficit while piling up still larger annual deficits?

It is not sleight of hand. The President's savings are possible only because the budget plans are measured from a budget baseline that overstates the anticipated cost of Government.

When the President's latest plan is compared to a no-growth baseline that allows spending to increase only by the rate of inflation and growth in the number of program beneficiaries, it does not save any money at all. Instead it adds $8 billion to what would have been, without further action, a deficit of $555 billion.

The thing to concentrate on is not how much is saved, but the annual difference between what the Government spends and what it raises through taxation.

Measured by that standard, the President's deficit reduction plans are dismal failures that belie his claim of fiscal responsibility and his call for a balanced budget amendment.

The DSG proposal has a sensible spending plan. It provides a modest reduction in baseline spending for domestic programs and it protects areas of high national priority, such as defense spending, the elderly and the needy.

On the revenue side, the DSG budget substitute proposes $76.2 billion in additional revenue over 3 years—$14.3 billion in fiscal year 1985, $27.3 billion in fiscal year 1986 and $34.6 billion in fiscal year 1987.

While the DSG plan does not say how this revenue would be produced, the revenue gain would be expected to be achieved through enactment of H.R. 4170, which already has been reported by the Committee on Ways and Means, and adoption of the proposed Pease tax reform amendment to H.R. 4170, both of which I support.

The substitute budget already offered by the Congressional Black Caucus is the only proposal made in order by the Rules Committee that would have cut annual deficits below that proposed by the DSG. I could not support that plan, however, because of the drastic cuts it would have required in defense.

If the DSG proposal fails, I intend to vote for the so-called MacKay substitute, offered by my friend from Florida, a fellow Democratic freshman.

The MacKay substitute would cut a little more deeply into domestic spending, reducing it by $21 billion over 3 years and raise only $49.8 billion in new taxes, again through enactment of H.R. 4170. Defense spending would get a full inflationary increase, the same as proposed by the DSG.

While the MacKay substitute is not perfect, it will be the best remaining alternative to the Budget Committee proposal, should the DSG plan fail.

The MacKay freeze plan would result in annual deficits of $169.6 in fiscal year 1985, $156.1 in fiscal year 1986, and $152.3 in fiscal year 1987.

Again, as with the DSG package, the MacKay substitute would produce real deficit reduction with projected annual deficits declining from year to year.

There are many on this side of the aisle who have criticized the MacKay substitute as being insensitive to the needy.

I suggest that those who are concerned about social spending and the response of this Government to people in need had better look at the impact that budget deficits are having on our ability to provide for those needs both today and in the future.

The interest costs that these deficits require dwarf the $5 billion in social spending that many of my colleagues would like to have seen included in the MacKay substitute. I, too, would like to have that spending included and will vote for it as part of the DSG package. Unfortunately, many of those same colleagues are not willing to raise taxes to pay for the spending they claim is so desperately needed.

If the interest costs of the Federal Government keep rising, we will not have the capacity to respond at all to human need. Those who are concerned about human needs must join the effort to bring these deficits under control.

If this body decides to reject the DSG and MacKay proposals, I will support the budget proposal advanced by the Budget Committee.

It is not a good proposal since it fails to make substantial reduction in projected annual deficits.

While it would reduce deficits, it is in truth, more of a deficit maintenance than a deficit reduction program.

However, it is significantly better than the President's two proposals, which actually raise annual deficits, and the two substitutes offered by Members on the other side of the aisle, each of which would adopt the President's plan to increase defense spending by 40.9 percent over 3 years, but refuse to raise taxes to pay for this unwarranted defense buildup.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I want to bring to my colleagues' attention a budget proposal that I sought to have made in order Tuesday in testimony before the House Rules Committee.

Although the Rules Committee decided not to allow my substitute amendment, which is printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, April 3, 1984, H2255-H2260, I believe that it would have provided the House with an opportunity to vote on a deficit-reduction plan that is substantially better than those advanced today.

My substitute assumed the spending plan advanced in House Concurrent Resolution 282, the bill reported, but later abandoned, by the Budget Committee. These are the same spending priorities now found in the MacKay substitute.

In terms of domestic spending, my plan would have provided a 3.5-percent increase—1.2 percent less than the rate of inflation—for all programs, except social security and means-tested entitlements, which would have gotten a full inflationary increase.

Defense spending, as measured by outlays, would have increased slightly faster than the rate of inflation, going up 6.5 percent in fiscal year 1985, 4.6 percent in fiscal year 1986 and 6.7 percent in fiscal year 1987 for a total increase of 18.7 percent over 3 years. The attached chart compares the defense figures under the GOP plans advanced by the President and my Republican colleagues and my own plan, which has the same defense figures as those advanced by the DSG and the MacKay substitutes.

I also proposed $113.3 in additional revenue over 3 years to further reduce the deficits. The revenue would have been derived from enactment of H.R. 4170—$49.8 billion—the Pease amendment—$26.4 billion—a 1-year delay in indexing of the tax tables to reflect inflation—$22.9 billion—and a 7-percent surcharge on taxable incomes over $60,000—$15.4 billion—which would restore only a small part of the revenue lost on taxation of such incomes as a result of the 3-year tax cut enacted in 1981.

My proposal would have reduced deficits to $165.5 in fiscal year 1985, $143.9 in fiscal year 1986, and $105.1 in fiscal year 1987, which is $93 billion less than that achievable in fiscal year 1987 under President Reagan's new plan and $24.2 billion less than the fiscal year 1987 deficit under the DSG plan.

This plan was workable and would have allowed the Government to meet its important responsibilities while making more serious reductions of the deficit. I have included in the RECORD a table which compares my plan with the Reagan compromise plan and the House Budget Committee plan that will be offered later today.

It is time for Congress to come to terms with the problem of $200 billion deficits looming, as Budget Director David Stockman suggested, "as far as the eye can see."

I think the only fair way to do that is through a combination of spending cuts which reduce spending by limiting excessive growth in the military and domestic budgets, protecting vulnerable individuals and raising enough revenue to pay for growth in spending from those who have the greatest ability to pay.

Mr. McHUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Montana (Mr. WILLIAMS).

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, there has been a great deal said about these budgets and this budget in particular. In the 2 minutes I have, let me address two of the important issues. One is revenue. Make no mistake about it, this Congress and the next President, be he Republican or Democrat, are going to ask for revenue increases larger than what we are considering in this budget. That is a fact. The taxpayers of this country ought to know that it is only because this is an election year, that taxes are not being increased to the amount to which they should be increased if we are going to get rid of this deficit.

This budget simply says we have courage to bite the tax bullet this year when that bullet needs biting. The second thing I want to focus on is a matter that this budget addresses somewhat, and that is jobs. This budget provides 3.5 percent real growth for the President's Job Training Partnership Act. Eight million people in this country are still looking for work, those are the ones that we count.

There is another million or so that we used to count that have just quit looking for work. The median duration of unemployment for individuals is still about 19 weeks.

When this President took office, the unemployment rate in America was 7.5 percent. A few months later, because of a half-baked economic policy, including taxes and spending, that rate jumped from 7.5 to 10.7 percent.

Let me tell my colleagues what that means. If the unemployed were standing in a line starting outside the door of this Capitol, that line of unemployed would have stretched all the way across this country to the President's estate in California, and back again to his hometown of Dixon, Ill.

We have to right America's compass and begin to spend money here at home in the domestic budget to put Americans back to work, to shorten that terrible, long line of unemployment that was caused by President Reagan.

Mr. McHUGH. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire as to how much time I have remaining?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman from New York (Mr. McHUGH) has 2 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATTA) has 18 minutes remaining.

Mr. McHUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 2 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman from New York (Mr. McHUGH) is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. McHUGH. Mr. Chairman, the question we now face is whether we are really serious about significant deficit reduction. If we are, there are two fundamental things we must do.

First, we must recapture a certain amount of revenue which has been lost because of the Reagan tax legislation.

Second, we must be more restrained on the spending side. With respect to spending, this substitute is moderate and responsible. There would be no greater increase than inflation for defense. There would be less than that for domestic programs in the aggregate.

With regard to revenue, remember that we are not voting on any specific revenue measure here today, not the Pease amendment or any other specific revenue measure. We are simply voting on a revenue target which would, in this substitute, increase the revenue target by $27 billion beyond what the Committee on the Budget has proposed for the next 3 years.

It seems to me incredible that anyone would say that they are serious about deficit reduction and also say that we cannot recapture $27 billion in new revenue over 3 years. We can do it if we are serious. This budget proposal would do it. It would make the largest reduction in budget deficits over 3 years, and I think it is a reasonable and realistic proposal.

Mr. PRITCHARD. Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the gentleman would yield?

Mr. McHUGH. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. PRITCHARD. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I want to commend the gentleman, and all the Members of Congress. I have been sitting here and thinking back to when I came here 12 years ago. How far off the mark we were on the budget, and how much more seriously we are addressing this subject today.

That does not mean that there are not differences in this House, but both from the minority side and the majority side, all of the proposals are far more constructive than we have had in the past; that actually parties here are responding to the pressure from the citizens. Everyone really is making efforts to hold down spending.

I know that there are differences of view as to the efforts.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York (Mr. McHUGH) has expired.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. McHUGH. I thank the gentleman for yielding this additional time to me, and I yield further to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. PRITCHARD. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I just think that rather than sitting here and beating each other up, we ought to recognize that some pretty full-faith efforts are being made by the different factions in this House and that we are coming a lot closer to our goals.

This is a tough problem, but we are making progress in cutting down on some of the defense. We are making progress in our needs for more revenue, and we are holding down spending. I think somebody ought to say we are making progress.

Mr. McHUGH. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for his comments and urge an affirmative vote on this substitute.

Mr. REGULA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McHUGH. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. REGULA. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I think the effort that the gentleman is making in cutting defense is a good one. I would want to point out that when the gentleman is talking about zero growth, to achieve that is going to take a huge bite out of operations and maintenance and out of people. In order to have a volunteer force, we have had to get into great expenses to attract people to serve.

When we look at the demographics in terms of young people who will be available as volunteers in the years ahead, it would seem to me that we are going to have to do more in personnel costs. I would be interested in how the gentleman would respond, inasmuch as about half of the defense budget is personnel.

Mr. McHUGH. My first response to the gentleman is that he knows and we all know that the Senate is going to pass a budget resolution which will have a real increase for defense of approximately 8 percent. This is, in my judgment, more than we can afford and more than we need.

Therefore, the real issue is ultimately going to be what level of real increase is fair and justified. I think if we go into conference with an inflation adjustment only, and the Senate comes in with 8 percent, we will wind up with a number for defense which is more reasonable.

● Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the substitute budget resolution amendment offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. McHUGH).

Of all the budget proposals before us, I believe the McHugh substitute provides the necessary balance among the foremost objectives we must address in the budget for fiscal year 1985. The McHugh amendment strikes this balance in a realistic fashion by rejecting further expansion of the already bloated military budget, providing $16 billion in domestic spending savings by holding the line on spending growth, and raising an additional $76 billion in revenue for deficit reduction purposes. Combined, these actions will reduce the deficit during the next 3 years by $262 billion over the current policy baseline, according to the Congressional Budget Office.

Equally important, the McHugh amendment provides steadily declining deficit figures over the next 3 years, whereas the Budget Committee package, while providing deficit reductions less than the McHugh substitute, would not keep the deficit continuously declining. In fact, according to the CBO, the deficit in the third year of the Budget Committee resolution would increase by some $10 billion from fiscal year 1986 levels.

Mr. Chairman, it is time that this body stand up and reject the wasteful, economically crippling and internationally destabilizing military policy of the Reagan administration. The Pentagon is spending money faster than it knows what to do with it, not only in regard to spare parts and lucrative noncompetitive defense contracts which attract media attention, but also on needless and ineffective weapons systems, the costs of which will steadily increase in future years. It is time to trim the Pentagon's shopping lists and require the same sort of belt tightening in the military which we have asked of domestic programs.

In terms of domestic spending, again, I believe the McHugh substitute is realistic in the spending cuts it proposes. There is no question that such adjustment will be painful. But equally unquestionable is the damage that these exorbitantly high deficits will inflict upon the Nation for years unless we confront them in a fair, rational, and workable manner. The McHugh substitute is such a package.

It is fair in that the means-tested entitlement programs will be fully funded. The people affected by these programs—our Nation's poorest or most vulnerable—are the same people who have been hurt most by the Reagan administration's policies and the consequences of those policies: The recession, tax cuts for the wealthy and deep cuts in social programs. By maintaining funding for means-tested entitlement programs, we will be rejecting those who advocate balancing the budget on the backs of the elderly and the poor.

Finally, the revenue targets in the McHugh substitute will broaden the tax base and provide additional revenue for use in reducing the deficit. More than half the $76 billion revenue target can be raised through passage of the Ways and Means Committee bill (H.R. 3170) when it reaches the floor. Much of the additional revenue can be raised by curtailing some of the very generous provisions in the 1981 tax bill and by closing some of the egregious business tax loopholes in our Tax Code.

Mr. Chairman, we are dealing with an administration which has chosen to spend and spend over the last 3 years without providing the revenue to pay for that spending. In fact, this administration's policy has been to not only increase overall Federal spending, but to reduce the revenue base through massive tax breaks for the rich. The result, through simple arithmetic, is clear: The largest deficits in the Nation's history.

The McHugh substitute provides us with an opportunity to begin reversing the economic and social damage inflicted upon the Nation by the last 3 years of the administration policies. I offer my support for this proposal and urge my colleagues to do likewise.●

Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Chairman, I support the substitute offered by the gentleman from New York on behalf of the executive committee of the DSG, because I believe that Congress must make a start now on reducing President Reagan's proposed budget deficits and continue reducing them for the next 3 years.

The budget recommended by the House Budget Committee does not do enough to restrain military spending increases. Nor has the Budget Committee reduced the President's deficit sufficiently.

As vice chairman of the DSG, I am proud to be associated with and to have joined in developing the amendment now on the floor. Briefly, the substitute would do the following:

Provide for a deficit reduction totaling $261.5 billion over the period fiscal 1985–87;

Cut $140.4 billion from the military spending increase proposed in the President's February budget request;

Reduce domestic spending by $16 billion over the next 3 years;

Provide for $76.2 billion in additional revenues over the next 3 years.

It is a sound budget proposal; an improvement upon the recommendation of the House Budget Committee. It would reduce the budget deficits and military spending proposed by the President, which pose such serious threats to the economic recovery of this country.

The budget process offers the Members of this House the opportunity to establish our national spending priorities. How we vote today is a statement of what we are as a nation—our goals, our aspirations, and our principles as a people. This debate on the budget should be our finest moment—not a merely mechanical ritual.

The DSG substitute is a clean statement of disapproval of high deficits and the misallocation of national resources under President Reagan's budget.

We started writing our DSG substitute, however, with the intention of developing a budget which would draw broad support within the House—from Republican and Democratic Members alike, a budget which we could realistically expect would pass the House.

In joining this process, I recognized that our budget alternative would not cut military spending as much as I would have preferred. It is a compromise—but one that significantly restrains the military spending proposed by President Reagan. It does provide for an increase in military spending to offset inflation over the past year. We wrote it to be a practical budget document which could attract a majority of the votes of the Members of this House in order to provide for significant decreases in the President's budget request for military spending. We have achieved that goal. Our substitute provides for reduction of $140 billion in military spending over the next 3 years.

In addition to reducing the military spending, our budget avoids the disastrous and unfair cuts in domestic spending proposed by the Reagan administration.

Furthermore, we provide for a fair system of taxation. It will insure that those who draw the greatest benefits from this country will pay a more proportional share of the taxes.

Earlier today, I voted for the substitute offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. DIXON) on behalf of the Congressional Black Caucus. I voted for Mr. DIXON's substitute because it more accurately represents my view of how we should allocate our national priorities.

It provided for the smallest amount of Federal deficits over the next 3 years, actually would cut military spending from current levels, and called for an increase in programs to address the human needs of this Nation—programs for employment, health care, education, housing, elderly assistance. Programs for the neediest of our citizens. Regrettably, the House did not accept the Black Caucus substitute.

We have before us now the DSG substitute—which, in trying to do less, represents a broader consensus within the House as to what we should do in the first budget resolution.

The DSG substitute offers a sensible budget for true national security and for economic recovery.

I urge its adoption.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MCHUGH].

The question was taken; and the Chairman pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. MCHUGH. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The Clerk announced the following pair:

On this vote:

Mr. Hawkins for, with Mr. Ray against.

Messrs. BRITT, OWENS, SPRATT, ROBERT F. SMITH, and HERTEL of Michigan changed their votes from "aye" to "no."

Messrs. ANNUNZIO, WYDEN, and MOAKLEY changed their votes from "no" to "aye."

So the amendment in the nature of a substitute was rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

AMENDMENT IN THE NATURE OF A SUBSTITUTE OFFERED BY MR. MACKAY

Mr. MACKAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will designate the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The text of the amendment in the nature of a substitute is as follows:

Amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by Mr. MACKAY:

Strike all after the resolving clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the Congress hereby determines and declares that the concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1984 is hereby revised and replaced, the first concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1985 is hereby established, and the appropriate budgetary levels for fiscal years 1986 and 1987 are hereby set forth:

(a) The following budgetary levels are appropriate for the fiscal years beginning on October 1, 1983, October 1, 1984, October 1, 1985, and October 1, 1986:

(1) The recommended levels of Federal revenues are as follows:

Fiscal year 1984: $664,900,000,000.
Fiscal year 1985: $742,200,000,000.
Fiscal year 1986: $811,600,000,000.
Fiscal year 1987: $884,800,000,000.

and the amounts by which the aggregate levels of Federal revenues should be increased are as follows:

Fiscal year 1984: $1,900,000,000.
Fiscal year 1985: $9,200,000,000.
Fiscal year 1986: $16,700,000,000
Fiscal year 1987: $21,300,000,000.

(2) The appropriate levels of total new budget authority are as follows:

Fiscal year 1984: $915,500,000,000.
Fiscal year 1985: $990,850,000,000.
Fiscal year 1986: $1,063,750,000,000
Fiscal year 1987: $1,139,350,000,000.

(3) The appropriate levels of total budget outlays are as follows:

Fiscal year 1984: $853,900,000,000.
Fiscal year 1985: $911,350,000,000.
Fiscal year 1986: $967,800,000,000.
Fiscal year 1987: $1,037,150,000,000.

(4) The amounts of the deficits in the budget which are appropriate in the light of economic conditions and all other relevant factors are as follows:

Fiscal year 1984: $189,000,000,000.
Fiscal year 1985: $169,150,000,000.
Fiscal year 1986: $156,200,000,000.
Fiscal year 1987: $152,350,000,000.

(5) The appropriate levels of the public debt are as follows:

Fiscal year 1984: $1,595,800,000,000.
Fiscal year 1985: $1,827,900,000,000.
Fiscal year 1986: $2,058,850,000,000.
Fiscal year 1987: $2,295,000,000,000.

and the amounts by which the statutory limits on such debt should be accordingly increased are as follows:

Fiscal year 1984: $105,800,000,000.
Fiscal year 1985: $232,100,000,000.
Fiscal year 1986: $230,950,000,000.
Fiscal year 1987: $236,350,000,000.

RECONCILIATION

SEC. 2. (a) Not later than May 1, 1984, the House committees named in subsections (b) through (i)(1) of this section shall submit their recommendations to the House Budget Committee. After receiving those recommendations, the committee on the Budget shall report to the House a reconciliation bill or resolution or both carrying out all such recommendations without any substantive revision.

(b) The House Committee on Agriculture shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority by $50,000,000 and outlays by $50,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of budget authority by $800,000,000 and outlays by $800,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of budget authority by $1,700,000,000 and outlays by $1,700,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(c) The House Committee on Armed Services shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce outlays by $300,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of outlays by $650,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of outlays by $1,000,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(d) The House Committee on Education and Labor shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce outlays by $150,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of outlays by $150,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of outlays by $200,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(e) The House Committee on Energy and Commerce shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority by $1,000,000,000 and outlays by $1,000,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of budget authority by $1,350,000,000 and outlays by $1,350,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of budget authority by $1,650,000,000 and outlays by $1,650,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(f) The House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce outlays by $550,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of outlays by $1,300,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of outlays by $1,800,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(g) The House Committee on Small Business shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee sufficient to reduce outlays by $200,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of $150,000,000 in budget authority and $200,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of $250,000,000 in budget authority and $200,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1987.

(h) The House Committee on Veterans' Affairs shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority by $150,000,000 and outlays by $400,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of budget authority by $50,000,000 and outlays by $250,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of budget authority by $250,000,000 and outlays by $250,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(i)(1) The House Committee on Ways and Means shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority by $1,000,000,000 and outlays by $1,000,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of budget authority by $1,400,000,000 and outlays by $1,400,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of budget authority by $1,750,000,000 and outlays by $1,750,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(2) The House Committee on Ways and Means shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee sufficient to increase revenues by $9,200,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires increases of $16,700,000,000 in revenues in fiscal year 1986; and requires increases of $21,300,000,000 in revenues in fiscal year 1987.

GENERAL PROVISIONS

SEC. 3. (a) For fiscal years 1985, 1986, and 1987, any revenues raised by legislation enacted on or after March 15, 1984, shall only be used to reduce the Federal budget deficits for such fiscal years except to the extent that such legislation earmarks all or any part of such revenues for specific spending programs.

(b) Pursuant to subsection (a) of this section and notwithstanding the spending levels contained in section 1 of this resolution, funding for specific low-income programs, such as—

(1) an employment initiative for disadvantaged youth;

(2) public works jobs for community renewal;

(3) increased funding for the Aid to Families with Dependent Children program and the State component of the Supplemental Security Income program to ensure that the purchasing power of recipients is maintained;

(4) increased funding for title XX of the Social Security Act; and

(5) an increase in the earned income tax credit; would be appropriate if the authorizations for such programs are enacted and if sufficient revenues or outlay reductions are also enacted to ensure that the legislation is deficit neutral.

ADMINISTRATIVE SAVINGS

SEC. 4. It is the sense of the Congress that the Executive Branch achieve at least $2 billion in savings over fiscal years 1985 through 1987 by implementing those recommendations of the President's Private Sector Survey on Cost Control requiring administrative action within that branch of Government. It is further the sense of the Congress that the President shall report to Congress each year, in conjunction with the annual budget submission, on the progress made in achieving the savings required by this section.

AUTOMATIC SECOND BUDGET RESOLUTION

SEC. 5. (a) If Congress has not completed action by October 1, 1984, on the concurrent resolution on the budget required to be reported under section 310(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 for the 1985 fiscal year, then this concurrent resolution shall be deemed to be the concurrent resolution required to be reported under section 310(a) of such Act, for the purposes of the prohibitions contained in section 311 of such Act, notwithstanding congressional action or inaction on any reconciliation requirements contained in this concurrent resolution.

(b) Section 311(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, as made applicable by subsection (a) of this section, shall not apply to bills, resolutions, or amendments within the jurisdiction of a committee, or any conference report on any such bill or resolution, if—

(1) the enactment of such bill or resolution as reported;

(2) the adoption and enactment of such amendment; or

(3) the enactment of such bill or resolution in the form recommended in such conference report; would not cause the appropriate allocation for such committee of new discretionary budget authority or new spending authority as described in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 made pursuant to section 302(a) of such Act for fiscal year 1985 to be exceeded.

(c) The provisions of this section shall cease to apply when Congress completes action on a subsequent concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1985 pursuant to section 304 or 310 of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974.

"PAY AS YOU GO" TRUST FUND AMENDMENT

SEC. 6. (a) For purposes of the spending levels for fiscal year 1985 contained in section 1 of this resolution, and the assumptions upon which they are based, and for purposes of determining whether or not a committee exceeds its section 302(a) allocation of new discretionary budget authority or new spending authority for the prohibition contained in section 5 of this resolution, any new discretionary budget authority or new spending authority contained in a bill, resolution, amendment, or conference report shall be disregarded if the budget authority for outlays which will result from such new discretionary budget authority or such new spending authority is derived from any trust fund—

(1) the expenditures from which are available for highway, mass transit, or aviation purposes;

(2) for which new or expanded user fees or taxes were enacted during the 97th Congress; and

(3) which is described in section 401(d)(1)(B) of the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Act of 1974.

(b) For purposes of the spending levels for fiscal year 1985 contained in section 1 of this resolution, and the assumptions upon which they are based, and for purposes of determining whether or not a committee exceeds its section 302(a) allocation of new discretionary budget authority or new spending authority for the prohibition contained in section 5 of this resolution, any new discretionary budget authority contained in a bill, resolution, amendment, or conference report to fund programs under the comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act of 1980 shall be disregarded to the extent that such bill, resolution, amendment, or conference report contains revenue sufficient to cover such new spending, or to the extent that sufficient revenue to cover such increases is included in the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation and Liability Act of 1980.

SECTION 302(b) FILING REQUIREMENT

SEC. 7. (a) It shall not be in order in the House of Representatives to consider any bill or resolution, or amendment thereto, providing—

(1) new budget authority for fiscal year 1985;

(2) new spending authority described in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act first effective in fiscal year 1985; or

(3) direct loan authority, primary loan guarantee authority, or secondary loan guarantee authority for fiscal year 1985;

within the jurisdiction of any committee which has received an allocation pursuant to section 302(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of discretionary budget authority or new spending authority, as described above, for such fiscal year, unless and until such committee makes the allocation or subdivisions required by section 302(b) of the Congressional Budget Act, in connection with the most recently agreed to concurrent resolution on the budget.

(b) The prohibition contained in subsection (a) shall not apply until twenty-one days of continuous session, as defined in section 1011(5) of the Impoundment Control Act of 1974, after Congress completes action on this concurrent resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to House Resolution 476, the amendment in the nature of a substitute is considered as having been read.

The gentleman from Florida (Mr. MACKAY) will be recognized for 30 minutes, and a Member opposed will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from Florida (Mr. MACKAY) for 30 minutes.

Mr. MACKAY. Mr. Chairman, I intend to cover two points in the opening of this debate. The first is a technical point which will be covered in detail by the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. JONES), the chairman of the Budget Committee. It has to do with the impact of the MacKay-Nelson freeze substitute on the social security disability program. There is a technical error in the bill in the way it is drafted. We are advised that this can be handled and should not be cause for alarm. It can be handled at the conference committee level if this should pass. It should not be considered as a substantive matter in the decision on this vote.

The second point is an outline of the policy issues covered by the MacKay-Nelson substitute. This is a freeze substitute, an across-the-board freeze. It is the simplest of all the alternatives available to the House during this debate. It simply freezes spending across the board at 3.5 percent above the 1984 levels, with defense, social security, and some of the safety-net programs being increased to the level of inflation; $47 billion in new tax revenues from H.R. 4170 are applied totally to the deficit reduction. The total 3-year deficit reduction is $234 billion.

This is not a final solution. Nobody expects a final solution.

This is a start. It is a start in the right direction. It is a signal to the private sector, to our financial markets, to our friends and allies that the Congress and the President are willing to begin a serious effort over the next year or two to develop a stable and balanced monetary policy.

As proponents of the spending freeze we are not arguing that our defense needs are not important. Clearly they are.

We are equally concerned about our programs for the needy. But unless we make sense out of the Federal budget these other crises are not going to make much difference.

The MacKay-Nelson substitute applies the same techniques as we would in our families and in our businesses, freezing expenditures across the board and applying all available revenues to reducing our debts.

I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida (Mr. MACKAY) has consumed 2 minutes.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATTA) is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I reserve my time.

Mr. MACKAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. JONES), chairman of the Budget Committee.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Again I want to explain what is in this substitute and to reiterate what I am sure many Members are tired of hearing. The vote you cast on the budget, if it should prevail, should be the same kind of vote you are willing to cast next week, next month, when we implement the budget.

I do want to commend the gentleman from Florida (Mr. MACKAY) and all of the others, the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. AUCOIN), the gentleman from Florida (Mr. NELSON), the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. SLATTERY), and the others who have worked so hard on the substitute.

Essentially this freeze substitute is the Budget Committee bill without the pay-as-you-go amendment. But that is a significant difference that I hope the Members will focus on.

What this bill does is first of all to take social security and the means tested programs and allow them to grow with the rate of inflation only.

Second, all other programs are held to a 3.5-percent nominal growth, which is about two-thirds of inflation or something less than inflation.

Third, military spending is held only to the rate of inflation for 3 years, with no real increases in military expenditures during that time.

Again, as I say, as many of you know, this is the position that I had been talking about since January. But if Members vote for this, let us be clear that the chances are good that we are not going to have a conference before the miltiary budget comes up and so Members who vote for this will also be expected to vote to implement these appropriations with no real increases on military, no real increases on domestic programs.

I say this just so we are very sure as to where we are on this substitute.

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PICKLE. The amendment offered by the gentlemen from Florida (Mr. MACKAY and Mr. NELSON) does not contain money that would allow for the implementation of the disability bill which the House passed a week ago, by a vote of 410 to 1.

As I understand it, the gentleman from Florida (Mr. MACKAY) assumed the leadership of this amendment which was the original Jones amendment, with the understanding that funds for the disability program would have been in that amendment. He attempted, when he found out that that was not the case, through the Rules Committee to have it included. The rule had already been granted and they, the Rules Committee, would not give him an amended rule which would have provided the funds.

So my inquiry to the gentleman from Oklahoma or the gentleman from Florida is to inquire if it is their intent that these moneys be included. I think there is a same appeal to the MacKay amendment. I do not want to vote for any amendment, however, if at some point we would not be able to get funds for the disability bill, assuming that the other body would advance it.

I want to be sure that would be provided for at some point later on in conference or that that would be the intent of the authors.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Let me be clear that the bill as it stands now does not have the provisions for the disability reform that passed the House a week or so ago. And it does not provide for any real increases in any spending or any new spending programs.

I would also tell the gentleman, as the gentleman well knows, there are three programs of new spending that I think ought to be included in any budget that this Congress deals with. One is the disability bill. One is the child health assurance program. And one is the child nutrition bill. And whatever budget passes, it would be the intention of this Member that those three new programs will be a part of anything that comes out of conference.

But they are not contained in this substitute now. It does not contain it at the present time.

Mr. PICKLE. My concern again is that it was your intent, that you felt that the disability funds would be in the original Jones amendment and that you have no objection that that be included at some point as we go along.

Under the rule, Mr. MACKAY would not be allowed to amend his amendment. I want to be sure if it did receive a vote today that those funds could be added.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Again let me reiterate they are not in this substitute now. But I feel very strongly that the disability legislation, the child health assurance legislation and child nutrition ought to be a part of my budget, and I would be fighting for those either to put them in conference or to retain them in the conference.

Mr. PICKLE. I appreciate that.

As chairman of the Social Security Subcommittee and as a coauthor with some of my colleagues on the disability bill, I do not view with great alarm the fact that the disability fund is not in this particular budget. I could not vote for this amendment if funds were not allowed later, and the gentleman from Florida assures me, and this is confirmed by the gentleman from Oklahoma, that they would provide for the addition of these funds. I am satisfied with that assurance.

Mr. MACKAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Florida (Mr. NELSON) a member of the Budget Committee.

Mr. NELSON of Florida. Mr. Chairman, Bob Giaimo, the former chairman of the House Budget Committee, and John Rhodes, the former House Republican leader, have formed a task group and have printed this pamphlet entitled "The Deficit Crisis."

I want to read to you the opening statement.

> The United States today is facing a crisis so urgent and so severe that it threatens to tear apart the very fabric of our economic and political life. It is the prospect of continuous, huge Federal deficits.

Members of Congress have received that same message back in our home districts. My folks are telling me that they want Congress to stop talking about deficit reduction and start doing something about it.

So today you have to decide if you want to do something about the deficit. You have that opportunity now.

If you are going to do something about it there will be a political risk, because some spending restraint will be unpopular with certain constituencies.

You must also judge what is politically possible as a spending restraint package, not what is perfect, but what is possible.

Please understand that what we are doing here today is just a beginning. Next year, after the partisan charged political atmosphere of a Presidential election, then we must continue this task with significant deficit reduction.

I would recommend to you this substitute amendment which starts with the 1984 spending level.

Notice, here we are reversing the psychology of "business as usual." Most budget deliberations start from the President's requested budget. Then it is a question of what you cut back or what you add to the President's request.

The psychology of the amendment is to start with the previous year's spending level, the 1984 spending level.

This amendment simply says we are going to raise everything above the 1984 spending level by 3½ percent. In three sensitive areas, the rise in spending will be as much as inflation—in social security, defense, and social safety net programs.

This amendment also provides that new tax revenues will only be used for deficit reductions.

This package will save $234 billion over 3 years.

This budget is simple and understandable. In these times of economic emergency, it is necessary that the Government restrain its spending all across the board.

Mr. MACKAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. PENNY).

Mr. PENNY. Mr. Chairman, Americans are commonsense people. Commonsense told them that a $50 billion budget deficit 4 years ago was bad for the economy. Commonsense tells them that when you then proceed, as the President and Congress did, to cut taxes and increase spending, the budget will only go deeper into the red.

That is basic arithmetic, and that is what has happened.

Common sense now tells them that a $200 billion deficit is a frightening threat to the economy today.

Common sense tells the American people that both the President and the Congress must share the blame for this current deficit and must share the responsibility to solve this crisis. And, yes, Americans have the commonsense to know that to reduce the red ink we must either reduce spending, increase taxes, or do a little of each.

It is plain and simple; there is no other way.

The MacKay substitute is the only commonsense budget before us today. It is the only budget that implements a freeze across the board so that no program receives more than an inflation adjustment.

Quite simply, it spends less than any of the alternatives. Commonsense says you cannot cut the deficit by spending more.

In addition, the MacKay substitute allows all new tax revenues to go toward deficit reduction. Commonsense says you cannot cut the deficit if you find new ways to spend what you raise in taxes.

Mr. Chairman, the MacKay substitute makes sense to the American public. It will make for a sensible and responsible budget.

I urge my colleagues to support the MacKay substitute.

Mr. MACKAY. Mr. Chairman, I have an inquiry of the Chair as to whether the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. LATTA) intends to use his time.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio seek to be recognized?

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, is the gentleman from Florida (Mr. MACKAY) out of time?

Mr. MACKAY. No; I am not.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, we reserve our time.

Mr. MACKAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. LEVITAS).

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Chairman, "Here's the beef."

Here's where we get serious and here's where we decide whether we are going to change our rhetoric into action.

The budget freeze is the only way you can ever begin to get control of spending and deficits and do it in an equitable way across the board, treating everybody and every program equally. We need to do something that is both dramatic and drastic.

The people understand a budget freeze. This is what they will understand on Main Street and this is what they will understand on Wall Street. I get the feeling that some of the budget experts around here who are just talking to each other while the people of America, starting 100 yards from here, neither understand nor care what these experts are talking about.

Those of you who have made speeches to your constituents about cutting the deficit and holding down spending, here is your chance to put up or shut up.

It is obvious that the President's budget we received from the Rose Garden is not serious about holding down the deficit. It appears that our leadership on both sides of the aisle have presented us with budgets that do not seriously deal with the deficit. The Budget Committee budget is better than the Latta budget, but neither does enough about the deficit. These budget experts here in Congress are simply rearranging the furniture on the deck of the budget Titanic.

Here is the way you do it and you do it fairly. You do it by starting with a halt, a freeze at last year's levels.

Someone said, "Aren't you going to need more for defense?" We are going to have to feed everybody out of the same spoon under this budget. We need to have a strong economy if we are going to have a strong defense. Nevertheless, there is plenty of room in this budget to fund new defense spending. Yes, new defense spending. It was explained very clearly yesterday that we have got over $90 billion of potential savings in the Defense Department identified by the Grace Commission from these existing Pentagon expenditure levels. The money that the Grace Commission has identified as waste in the Pentagon can be used to buy anything we need to keep America strong.

As one who supports a strong defense, I support the freeze amendment because it gives us a strong economy and we can pay for anything we need out of the Grace Commission savings we can make from the waste that has been identified. The main point is that we must, absolutely must, get control over the budget and the deficit.

I heard a Republican colleague say yesterday that it does not make any difference whether you tax or you borrow to fund the budget. Well, I can assure you that "tax and tax and spend and spend" is bad. But what is worse is, "borrow, borrow and spend and spend." Anybody who does not know the difference has never heard of the word "interest," and that is why we have the budget deficit problem we have today.

There is a relationship between deficits and high interest rates. The deficit problem is a real and serious one. The bipartisan Committee for a Responsible Budget has said the following:

> The United States today is facing a crisis so urgent and so severe that it threatens to tear apart the very fabric of economic and political life. It is the prospect of continuous large Federal deficits.

That is why I urge you to vote for the budget freeze.

That is why we must take dramatic action.

That is why I voted against the rule. It did not give us a realistic opportunity to vote for deeper spending cuts, deeper reductions in the deficit and extensive and meaningful pay-as-you-go amendments.

That is why I voted for the Roemer substitute: to signal that we have to take dramatic action. There were parts of the Roemer substitute that I could not and would not support. For example, while I agree we need to address entitlement COLA's if we are to control spending, we do not need to restrict the social security COLA because it is a self-funding program whose funds cannot be used to reduce the budget deficit or pay for anything other than Social Security. Since there are adequate funds in the Social Security fund to pay the full COLA, it should be provided and I will vote to do so. The same would be true for any self-funded program whose funds cannot be used for any other purpose including deficit reduction. However, for the nontrust fund entitlements, we must never again say they are "uncontrollable," and that is what the Roemer amendment signaled.

That is why I have reservations about voting for the Democratic Budget Committee. It is not a bad budget. In fact it may be the best Democratic budget in a long time. But it could have been so much better, with a deeper deficit reduction and real pay-as-you-go amendments funded from spending cuts or earmarked revenues. While the budget resolution does endorse the pay-as-you-go concept—which is a victory in itself—it does not go far enough. So it may be better to vote against it now and see what comes out of the conference.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I urge support of the budget freeze substitute with its fair and equitably shared sacrifice, with its restraint and control on spending—over $20 billion less than the President's budget—and with its deeper deficit reduction—over $20 billion less than the President's budget. It is not the final answer, but it is a good beginning.

Mr. MACKAY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. LATTA. Mr Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. MILLER).

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, Members got up here and said they supported this freeze, suggesting that somehow they would be prepared to suffer political unpopularity; that they would be prepared to suffer some political risk.

Well, let me tell you what you do when you pass this freeze: 100,000 women, infants, and children are going to suffer more than political unpopularity; some of them are going to suffer retardation, some of them are going to suffer death and some of them are going to suffer birth defects, because that is the impact of not being able to participate in the women's infant's and children's program, when you are poor, when you are at nutritional risk, and your baby suffers low birth weight.

I invite you to go to the baby hospitals of this country and look at the children, look at the children that are under 2 pounds, the children who are under 5 pounds, and understand what it means for them to participate in this program; because under this freeze, 100,000 of them will not be able to participate.

The children who cannot read, to whom we provide compensatory education, they will not suffer political unpopularity, they will suffer illiteracy.

For the people who suffer from not being able to pay their home heating bills, they will freeze, not Members of this Congress. It is wonderful how quickly we dole out the pain when not a single Member of this Chamber will suffer that pain; when not a single Member of this Chamber will endure the suffering of those children, of those women, of those elderly.

You are living a fraud. This budget is a lie. You like to believe that you are going to lower the military spending and in your hearts you know not for a moment, that the Senate will never go along with it, our Republican colleagues will not go along with it.

But I will tell you what they will go along with; they will go along with Gramm-Latta 3, because that is what this is on the social side of the ledger.

You will never see those figures go up. That is what you are participating in. You think it is an act of courage. What it is, is an act of callousness, an act of insensitivity to the people of this country who have no other resource than the Federal Treasury. Why? Because they are poor, they are old, they are disabled, and they are young.

That is the money we are talking about freezing.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. WAXMAN).

Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to vote against the MacKay amendment.

This amendment would have a devastating impact on a number of health programs. I want to point out the amount of cut it will mean for some of these critical health programs for the poor.

The MacKay substitute will mean real cuts in such essential programs as maternal and child health services, community and migrant health centers, childhood immunizations, and important research at the National Institutes of Health.

The MacKay substitute would not allow room for any real growth in any health program for low-income people, no matter how pressing the need.

Funds for the Medicaid child health assurance program [CHAP], an important initiative for low-income pregnant women, would not be provided for in this proposal. And the disability provisions adopted by the Ways and Means Committee would also be eliminated.

The Senate bill does not provide funds for these programs. So if the MacKay amendment becomes the proposal from the House, that will be the ceiling on all the domestic programs.

The health spending cuts will be real. The program cuts for low-income people will be real, but the defense cuts will be illusory, because when the House and the Senate go into conference, we can expect that the Senate with their higher amounts for defense spending will insist that the House move up.

We urge that the Members vote against the MacKay substitute. It is essential that this proposal not constitute the budget finally passed by the House of Representatives. Do not fool yourself into thinking that this is a real freeze, that you are going to cut defense spending. The impact will be to cut domestic programs for low-income people by $5 million over what is provided for in the budget adopted by the House Budget Committee.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. GUNDERSON).

Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Chairman, it is not my intent to get up to speak for or against this budget, but I think in reference to those who have just preceded me in the well, we had better understand one thing.

This budget does not increase, nor does it decrease social programs. It has them exist at their present level. I think the Members can all decide whether that is good or bad, but let us not argue about what it does or does not do, because it does have inflation adjusted increases. The same level of the services will exist in the future that exist today. The Members can decide whether that is enough, too much, or not enough.

The purpose in seeking the well is to ask the gentleman from Florida, or anyone else who can help us in the area of defense. One concern I have about this budget is exactly what are we talking about in the area of defense? Are we freezing outlays, are we freezing authority? What are we doing with those authorized projects that we have already committed ourselves to in the last 3 to 4 years in this Congress?

Mr. NELSON of Florida. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GUNDERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Florida, for as long as it will take to enlighten us all in that regard.

Mr. NELSON of Florida. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Starting from the basis of the fiscal year 1984 spending level, $264 billion for defense. That is budget authority, which is what we are using in this comparison. This would bring, by rising by inflation, it would raise it by another $12 billion in budget authority to a level of $276 billion.

Incidentially, in outlays, the rise would be by $16 billion under this freeze proposal.

Mr. GUNDERSON. This is growth above and beyond inflation; is that correct?

Mr. NELSON of Florida. This is a growth of inflation which translates to a growth of $12 billion in budget authority and $16 billion in outlays under this proposal for defense.

Mr. GUNDERSON. That is interesting because the figure I have—and I am not sure where this chart comes from—indicates that the gentleman has a $21 billion increase in defense for fiscal year 1985 over fiscal year 1984. The gentleman would disagree with that particular figure?

Mr. NELSON of Florida. Right.

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GUNDERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. LEVITAS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The figures that the gentleman from Florida gave are those figures that I have seen as bearing on this, but I think the gentleman was on the floor when I made the point earlier that there are over $90 billion of waste that have been identified in existing spending levels by the Grace Commission at the Defense Department, which waste can be saved and used for the new funding, if that is desired under the freeze budget.

We are simply saying, as we do in other programs, there is waste, there is abuse. Let us save that money and spend it for what we need.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GUNDERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I just want to clarify this as I tried to in the beginning. There will be no increases above inflation for the next 3 years in military programs. So what the Appropriations Committee would get would be a limitation on defense expenditures only up to inflation for the fiscal year 1985.

If the Department of Defense can find Grace Commission savings on their own, that is fine. But that is what the Appropriations Committee would be given, the level up to inflation only, no real growth.

Mr. GUNDERSON. The alternative would be then that this Congress would have to in the defense authorization and appropriation bills make some cancellations of presently authorized projects to live within this?

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. This is something the gentleman probably should discuss with the chairman of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee, but it is my understanding that there would have to be cancellations of some weapons systems for this to be complied with.

Mr. MACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GUNDERSON. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. MACK. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I just wanted to ask one question. When the gentleman refers to inflation growth only in national defense, is that DOD inflation?

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. If the gentleman will yield further, 4.7 percent, I believe it is.

Mr. MACK. It is CPI? DOD? Or the Congressional Budget Office's estimate of inflation?

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. It is the DOD at 4.5.

Mr. MACK. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. MACKAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. MORRISON).

Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, this is not a perfect budget, but it is the best remaining alternative budget that we have.

The House Budget Committee is a deficit maintenance budget. It keeps the deficit under control, but it does not make substantial reductions in future annual deficits.

This freeze proposal reduces the deficit over 3 years by $52 billion more than is done by the House Budget Committee proposal.

Those who are concerned about social spending and the response of this Government to people in need had better look at the impact of budget deficits. The interest costs as they increase for the Federal Government will dwarf the $5 billion in social spending that we are addressing as the difference between the two budgets.

If the interest costs of the Federal Government keep rising, we will not have the capacity to respond at all to human need. Those who are concerned about human needs must join the project of bringing the deficits under control. This freeze proposal is a small but first step.

Mr MACKAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. SPRATT).

Mr. SPRATT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the MacKay substitute, not because I think it is where we should or will end up, but because I think it is where we ought to start out.

This substitute does not solve the deficit problem, but it is based on principles that will.

It lays down the principle that spending, across the board, has to be held in place, with no real growth. With the deficits we face, that is a sound fiscal principle.

It lays down the principle of applying new taxes, generated by new tax laws, to reduction of the deficit. That, too, is a sound principle, and one most Americans would agree with.

And it raises, indirectly, the principle of pay as you go. By implication, this substitute says, if the real level of defense or nondefense spending must rise, then we must find the revenues, new revenues, to fund the increase.

If we adhered to these principles, we could solve our problem.

This substitute is hard on social and domestic spending, but it is not as austere as a complete freeze, which the administration proposes. It allows for growth of 5 percent per year in means-tested entitlements, a full COLA for Social Security, and 3.5 percent in other nondefense spending.

It is tough on defense spending, but it realistically allows more for defense than for nondefense spending—a 5-percent rate of growth. And that is 5 percent of $264 billion, or an increase of $12 billion next year alone. That increase will take defense budget authority up to $276 billion next year, which is almost 100 percent above its level in 1980.

For the 3 million men and women on active duty or in the Reserves, a 5-percent rate of increase will more than fund the 3.5-percent pay raise we are now considering in the Military Personnel Subcommittee. There is no reason we would need to freeze their pay, or even reduce their raises below the level we are now discussing, or, for that matter, below the level of about 4 percent the administration has proposed.

I am under no illusions, however. This plan entails hard choices for defense. A 5-percent rate of increase in defense would mean the elimination of some weapons systems, like the MX; it would necessitate the stretchout of others, like the DIVAD, or the Aegis, or the F-15's; and it would mean not starting up new systems this year, like the new DDG-51 destroyers, or the C-17. This would not be easy to do. Maybe it cannot be done. But before concluding that it cannot be done, I would call your attention to William Kaufman's study for the Committee for National Security, entitled "Spending for a Sound Defense." His "present danger" defense budget, which is the stronger of his two alternatives, has a bottom line for fiscal year 1985 of $276 billion, exactly the same as this substitute.

Some opponents of this plan say that it will not stick, that defense will end up with some rate of real growth. They are probably right. But if we start the budget bargaining here, at the point of no real growth in defense, we will improve the chances of holding defense spending to limits of where it probably ought to be: at 3 to 3.5 percent real growth. And we will leave ourselves some leverage to argue that any increments beyond 5 percent ought to be paid for, and paid for now.

This substitute will not resolve the long-term deficit, but none of the eight choices before us will. The hard work is still ahead of us. But it will put deficits on a downward path; and it is based on budget principles out of which we can frame a solution. It is the most sensible choice we have, and I urge its adoption.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. FRANK).

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Chairman, I understand what motivates those who are pushing this substitute. But I think they are gravely mistaken. It is clear, if you trace out the necessary steps in the legislative process, that the unique contribution they will be making is to prevent us for several years from providing any additional funds for the neediest and the most vulnerable. The people who already have been made to sacrifice the most would be further victimized here.

That is not the intent of the amendment as proposed, but it is what happens when you work it out through conference. No one thinks that the zero level of increase in military spending would be sustainable after it went to conference and came back. But what would be sustainable would be the zero level of increase for the programs that the gentleman from California and others have mentioned.

I share the desire to reduce the deficit. I am willing to work with other Members to try to reduce military spending. But, please, let us not tell the poorest and most vulnerable people in this country that it is their fault and we are going to have to hold them hostage in our effort to reduce it.

It is a good intention, but the effect of it will be to inflict further misery on those who have already been the most afflicted.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. SHANNON).

Mr. SHANNON. I want to thank the gentleman from Ohio for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I take the floor because of one specific concern, and that is: What happens to the disability legislation as a result of this substitute?

Now, I understand that there has been a colloquy on the floor as to a good-faith effort that will be made by the conferees to take care of this issue. But the fact remains that in the other body there is a lot of opposition to that disability bill. The administration has gone over there and said that they want to defeat it, and there are going to be a lot of games played with this issue over the period of the next few weeks.

The House of Representatives voted last week by a margin of 410 to 1 to stop the disgraceful abuse of disabled people in this country, and now this week we are being asked to vote for a budget proposal that leaves no room for those reforms, leaves no room to restore the benefits to the people who have been knocked off the rolls, and leaves no room to put in those medical improvement standards; and to make those changes that we almost unanimously agreed needed to be made.

A colloquy on the floor of the House will not solve this problem. And, in fact, unless we can get some Members of the other body onto this floor to say that they will agree, we are leaving our disabled people very vulnerable by supporting this substitute on the floor today.

Let us be consistent. This might be a technical error, but it could be a fatal error for the disabled of this country if we were to pass this substitute in this resolution.

Mr. NELSON of Florida. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHANNON. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. NELSON of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I just want to see if I can give some assurance to the gentleman. The gentleman certainly well understands that we are dealing in the macroeconomics and the aggregates here, that any items specifically within this budget resolution are mere assumptions or suggestions.

This House has already acted, as the gentleman from Massachusetts has well understood, and you have also had the chairman of the Budget Committee stand up and say his preference of what would occur in conference.

Mr. SHANNON. If I may reclaim my time, I appreciate the statements of the gentleman from Florida and the chairman of the Budget Committee. I know they will make a good-faith effort. But they cannot make a commitment that the job will get done, because they are only one-half of the process. Let us protect the disabled, let us not set a trap for ourselves that is going to sink that disability bill. And that is what this substitute will do.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. GRAY).

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Chairman, I certainly understand what the gentleman from Florida is attempting to do. He wants to reduce deficits by a large amount, $234 billion. He wants a simple solution which is a freeze with 3.5 percent nominal growth, and he also wants to cut defense. Certainly his proposal does that. But it fails one important test, and that is the fairness test. It does not treat all the same, because in reality all have not been treated the same over the last 3 years. And so if we pass this freeze, you are freezing the inequity of the last 3 years, the suffering of those who are elderly, those who are young, those who are hungry. And let us not kid ourselves. We know that that freeze is not going to apply to defense when we go to conference. It is going to come back with real growth.

I wish I could support them if it could pass the fairness test, but it does not, and I urge my colleagues to oppose it.

Mr. MACKAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. CARPER).

Mr. CARPER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the MacKay substitute and ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

Like most of my colleagues who have spoken this week in support of or in opposition to one budget resolution or another, I have not seen, nor do I expect to see, one plan that combines a perfect balance of restraint in defense and nondefense spending with painless increases in revenues.

The MacKay substitute is not perfect in all respects either, but it does possess a number of virtues that merit it the very serious consideration of all of us in the Congress.

This plan represents the closest thing to a freeze on all spending that we will consider this year. It slows the growth of both defense and nondefense spending. It does it fairly and evenhandedly. It asks for an equal sharing of sacrifice from all of us.

The MacKay substitute provides for spending increases in no programs above the rate of inflation, although it does allow spending increases in three areas at rates equal to an anticipated 5-percent rate of inflation. The three areas that will be protected from inflation include defense, social security, and a number of domestic programs considered integral parts of our safety net for the neediest Americans. Under this plan, spending for certain other programs would grow at a rate less than the rate of inflation and other programs would be frozen at 1984 levels.

And yes, this plan includes a revenue raising measure, as well. It is a modest one when viewed in the context of the enormous deficits facing our Nation. But among the virtues of this budget plan is that all of the $47 billion it will generate over the next 3 years will be used, not to pay for increased spending, but to lower deficits.

In addition, these new revenues would be raised not through imposing income tax surcharges, sales taxes or other major new taxes, but primarily through a broadening of the tax base due to tax reform.

I realize that there are some of us who would prefer to see greater defense spending increases. There are others of us who would like to see greater increases in funding for our safety net programs, as well as for education or other particularly meritorious programs. But the hard truth is that our ship of state sails on perilous waters. We must focus our efforts this week and throughout this year on reducing those deficits in as fair and evenhanded a manner as possible—by holding the line on all spending. The MacKay substitute does this.

This approach is not especially complex or sophisticated. It is straightforward and understandable. By offering no preferential treatment to any one group, it may run the risk of incurring the enmity of some of them. But this budget also holds forth the promise of gaining the understanding and acceptance of those who understand that we all must share in reducing the deficit.

Mr. Chairman, if we are serious about taking action this year to stem the flood of red ink that threatens to engulf our country, this plan will reduce the projected deficits by over $230 billion over the next 3 years. If we are serious about doing so in a way that is evenhanded, this plan is about as fair to all of those competing for the taxpayer's dollar as we can devise this year. While few of us are likely to praise it for its perfection, there is absolutely no doubt in my mind that most Delawareans and, indeed, most Americans, will accept this approach as a reasonable and balanced fiscal plan. I urge its adoption.

Mr. MACKAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. ROWLAND).

Mr. ROLAND. I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the MacKay substitute as the fairest way to address the deficit problem. Although I am aware that whatever we pass in the House today is likely to be changed before the end of the year, this does represent a first step in meeting our responsibilities as elected Representatives.

I have long thought that an across-the-board freeze would be the best way to slow the patterns of excessive spending which have sabotaged a healthy economy. Under the MacKay substitute, no one would lose anything they have this year. By holding spending to the rate of inflation, basically just no new spending occurs.

I did not come to the conclusion to support this bill on my own. In talking with the people I represent, the equity of an overall freeze was frequently mentioned and supported. Now, I realize this substitute also calls for an increase in revenue, a concept of which I am not generally supportive. However, in this case, the taxes raised would be used solely to offset the deficit, not to fuel additional spending as would other proposals before us today.

A poll I recently conducted in my district showed that 55 percent of the people who responded would support some kind of tax increase if this revenue was applied to the deficit. This budget does that, and without increasing personal income taxes or altering the tax indexing now in place. By closing loopholes and making necessary reforms in the Tax Code, $47 billion over 3 years will be used to reduce the deficit. On its own, I would not support a tax bill, but combined with spending cuts as the majority of my constituency indicated support, it is the right approach. Even the housing industry has indicated support of this substitute.

Some may argue that reducing increases in Federal spending hurts people and programs. However, allowing the rate of growth to increase at the rate of inflation certainly will not do as much damage as a $200 billion a year deficit. Deficits are simply economically destructive. Reducing the one this country has is the most constructive action this Congress can take to indicate concern for those in need and to realistically maintain a defense system we can afford.

My vote to hold the line on defense spending in no way indicates my lack of support for an adequate military. I am convinced, however, that there is room for reducing spending by the Department of Defense without reducing necessary programs or weapons systems. Just recently the Grace Commission detailed areas in which DOD could cut spending where funds were being wasted or not used efficiently. If these programmatic recommendations were carried out, we could reduce military spending by $94.2 billion over a 3-year period. This would absolutely not jeopardize our national security.

I urge my colleagues' support of this proposal which sets as its only priority an overall reduction in the Federal budget deficit.

Mr. MACKAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. SLATTERY).

Mr. SLATTERY. I thank the gentleman from Florida for yielding, and I would like to publicly commend Mr. MACKAY's leadership this year in dealing with this particular issue.

I would also like to draw my colleagues' attention to a letter I received today from the National Association of Homebuilders, and in this letter, dated April 5, they are endorsing the MacKay freeze proposal as the most balanced and fair approach to dealing with the deficit crisis.

Mr. Chairman, I concede that this is tough medicine that we are talking about here today with the MacKay freeze. But I sincerely believe that the Federal deficit is a serious threat to our Nation's economic recovery and the economic stability of the Western World. As you consider this proposal, I hope you will focus on some basic points: This proposal does dramatically reduce the deficit by $234 billion over 3 years. This is nearly $150 billion more than the President's proposal in February. It is $50 billion more than the committee's recommendation, and it is $29 billion more than the Republican proposal.

This tremendous deficit reduction is achieved primarily by spending cuts, nearly $4 of spending cuts for every $1 of new tax revenue.

The only tax increases contemplated in this proposal are those contained in H.R. 4170, and I would submit that those are the same revenue proposals contemplated in the Republican package. All new revenues under this proposal would go to deficit reduction.

In addition to that, I would like for the Members to focus on the fact that the MacKay amendment contemplated almost $150 billion less spending than the President's budget request. Almost $30 billion less than the Republican substitute, and almost $55 billion less than the committee proposal.

This is a real spending freeze.

I know there is concern about the level of defense spending recommended in this proposal.

Frankly, I would like to have a slightly higher level of defense spending and I am confident that this provision will be changed in conference committee.

I believe this is a good position to bargain from.

Just keep in mind that between 1980 and 1984 we increased defense spending by almost $100 billion annually.

The bottom line with this proposal is—if you want to spend more money for defense or anything else—then pay for it.

If we are unwilling to pay for defense spending we must be willing to make the necessary adjustments in the Pentagon.

I urge my colleagues to support the MacKay amendment.

Let's stop the policy of spend and borrow and restore commonsense to our nation's fiscal policy.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. PANETTA).

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, I know this is a frustrating year and everybody has been searching around for easy answers. The struggle is to try to find easy answers that somehow do not involve tough choices. The reality is that when we try to do that, we get wrapped up in numbers and forget that numbers impact on people. We should have learned that lesson a few years ago when we adopted Gramm-Latta. We adopted numbers, but numbers impacted on the benefits for people at the lowest end of the ladder.

The same thing is true for the proposal that is before the House; it looks good, it sounds good; it sells good, but the reality is that those numbers will hurt people. You cannot have it both ways in this institution. We voted almost unanimously for a disability bill a few days ago. This vote, if you vote for this substitute, takes disability funding out. I have never been a part of a conference when you can bring in something you forgot to put in.

The reality is, you are voting to take it out. The same thing is true with regard to hunger issues; the same thing is true with regard to a whole series of programs on low income energy assistance, on housing, on education that we have built into this budget to try to restore some fairness.

I think one of the tests that has to be looked at in all of these budgets is the test of fairness. Do we balance those needs with the needs of defense and with revenues. All of us wish we had a vote to separate defense from domestic issues; that is not the case; that is not the rule. If you vote for this substitute you are voting to cut the very funds that will help restore fairness to the budget that the committee has come forward with.

I urge you to vote against the substitute.

Mr. MACKAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentlewoman from California (Mrs. BOXER).

Mrs. BOXER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, let us be clear about this freeze: Means-tested safety net programs go up 5 percent under this freeze, so let us not accuse any of us of endangering mothers and infants. Under this freeze we do sacrifice $4 billion of increased social spending, that is true. But we also cut $45 billion from defense. Some might even say this freeze is a change of priorities.

The President handed us a budget with a $200 billion deficit. We criticized it and rightly so, for its 18-percent increase in defense and no closing of tax loopholes. If we want to see real pain and suffering in this country, let us do little or nothing about deficits, then we will see 12-percent unemployment figures again.

We need, my colleagues, shared sacrifice. I have certain priorities, you know what those are. You have other priorities. But we must be willing to sacrifice those priorities together, and what better way to reduce deficits than to freeze spending in a fair, across-the-board fashion. The American people want it. It is simple and straightforward and let us do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida (Mr. MACKAY) has 9 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATTA) has 15 minutes remaining.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. DONNELLY).

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Chairman, very frankly the genesis of the MacKay substitute came from discussions in caucuses held amongst Democrats on the House Budget Committee. And in reality at one point during these discussions many members of the committee were moving toward this point until we had spent some time a few nights and a few days looking at the reality of what the MacKay sustitute and this so-called freeze would do the poorest people in our society.

I think there are two basic problems with it: One, the defense number is not real. Clearly, if I had my way, it would be a real defense number, but I think when this budget comes back from conference, we are going to see some upward push in that defense number.

Second in reality, it does not protect the poorest and the most disenfranchised people in our society. Those people that are the beneficiaries of the discretionary domestic programs. It is clear to me that over the course of the last few years, we as a Congress and this administration especially have asked these people to pay an inordinant price for fiscal policies and fiscal problems that we face as a nation.

Institutionally, it will put our conferees at an extremely disadvantaged position when we meet with the Senate in conference. That defense number will go up and many of the cuts, if approved by this House, will have to be swallowed by our conferees, and the constituencies that we were sent here to protect, will be unprotected by the actions of this House.

You know, the MacKay freeze reminds me of the proverbial forbidden fruit; it looks good, and it looks tasty until you pick it off the tree and bite it. The aftereffects are awful bitter; I would hope that this substitute is rejected overwhelmingly.

Mr. MACKAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota (Mr. DORGAN).

Mr. DORGAN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, a couple of years ago this country experienced its first $1 trillion in debt, and a couple of years from now it will experience its second trillion dollars in debt. It all happened in a very short period of time because this fiscal system of ours is out of control and the question is who is going to be the first to be responsible? Who is willing to do something about it?

Well, I support this MacKay budget substitute because I think it is time that we start to put on the brakes on deficit spending. I think it is interesting how we hear people in this Chamber talk about who the big spenders are. Take a look at this document that talks about all of the budgets. I will tell you who the big spender is, it is Ronald Reagan. He wants to spend more than any budget we are debating here in the House of Representatives. He coats his budget with sugar so it sells well to the uninformed. He does not want to tax you for it. He wants to borrow for it, to mortgage this country's future and have our children pay for his $626 billion on projected deficits for the next 3 years.

I think there ought to be enough of us in this Chamber to be responsible and say: "That does not work any more, we are not going to stand for it, we will not permit it." This MacKay proposal calls for a budget freeze and I understand safety net programs will only grow modesty, but it is something I am prepared to support because this country needs tough medicine to get this fiscal system of ours under control.

Some opponents say it is going to ravage the poor, that is a phony argument. They want us to spend $9 for the military to drive every new dollar for the poor. What kind of bargain is that? I am not willing to support that. For if we persist in that madess, the military will soon absorb all funding for needed safety net programs.

Who is going to be the first to be responsible? Who is going to take the first step? Those who say they believe in restraint for Federal spending?

Now is the chance, vote for a fair, realistic budget freeze. This is the only freeze in all the budget plans that has been put before this House of Representatives; the only approach that devotes all new revenues to deficit reduction. This is an opportunity to bring a fiscal mess into some order; to move us in the right budgetary direction; to restore fiscal balance; and to start moving toward a balanced budget for this country's future. If we do not take this step now, it is not going to happen in the future either.

I support the MacKay budget because I think it is a good document. Everybody here says, well, we share the goal. We just oppose the plan. Sure they oppose the plan; this plan takes some guts. But it is the right plan for right now and that is why I support it.

Mr. MACKAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. MOODY).

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman. with the other freeze labeled the McHugh freeze having failed, I strongly endorse this particular budget package.

□ 1500

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I am pleased and delighted to have the privilege of yielding 4 minutes to the majority leader, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. WRIGHT). He is on the same side of this issue as I am, and that does not happen very often.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I want to express my appreciation to the distinguished ranking minority member of the Committee on the Budget for yielding. I hope his and my being on the same side does not necessarily mean that both of us are wrong.

We are on the same side because common sense dictates that, for all of its superficial attractiveness, this particular amendment should be rejected. I rise reluctantly in opposition to it because I admire the motivation which impels some of those who have supported it.

There is a steely, cold honesty in saying that we are going to cut everything equally across the board. But in order to indulge that, you have to begin with the assumption that we have exactly the right set of priorities today.

Do you believe that? Do you really believe that we have the perfect set of spending priorities in our Federal Government today, with no important imbalances that require redress?

If you believe that, then you can vote for this amendment in good conscience. If you are willing to cut education in real terms below the amount of money that is being spent on it this year, you can vote for this. For my part, I believe there is a need to repair holes that have been ripped in the safety net, including compensatory education for the neediest of children and nutrition programs for the hungriest of children.

In the last 3 years, 60 percent of all the cuts that have been made in our budget have come out of that one-fifth of the budget which helps the hungry, the handicapped, the needy, the disadvantaged, the young people who want to get an education, and the elderly. Do we want to freeze those cuts in place and then cut those programs further, below the inflation rate?

Let nobody deceive you about the disability reforms that we voted so bravely to foster just a week ago. If we vote for this amendment, we may be unwittingly voting not to fund that disability bill. It is easy enough for the chairman of the committee to say it would be his intention to fight for money to be restored in the conference. That presupposes, however, that the Senate will include money in its resolution to accommodate our disability reform. It has shown no disposition to do so as of now. If the Senate should persist in its failure to do so, this would not be a conferenceable item. It would not be subject to the conference if it is not included in either resolution.

The same can be said for child health and child nutrition programs.

In order to support this amendment whole heartedly, we also must be prepared to vote to hold all defense investment, all military spending, at its present level. That means we must be willing to discontinue some of the weapons systems that have been previously approved by Congress.

The reason I was not able personally to vote for the amendment just rejected, to one offered by my good friend, Mr. McHUGH, and the Democratic Study Group, was that it held defense to a level which would have required us to disallow some of the programs that we earlier approved in this House. I believe strongly that we can satisfy our defense needs on a substantially lower rate of increase than that recommended by the White House. I do not think we have to give the Pentagon a blank check, and I do not believe we will. I do not think we should. But neither do I believe that we ought to cut it off at the knees. This amendment allows for no real growth, and I believe that may be too restrictive.

If you are really willing to do those things, then go ahead and vote for this amendment. But if you vote for it, be prepared to implement it. If you are not prepared to implement it, I suggest you vote "no."

Mr. MACKAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DURBIN).

Mr. DURBIN. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, it is unfortunate we did not include in this budget resolution enough money for a white flag. Every Democratic speaker who has gotten up to criticize this proposal has suggested that the conference committee will capitulate as soon as it arrives in the room with the Senate conferees, and we should have at least provided them with a white flag.

I think more of the process. I think more of what we face today, because if we look at what has happened to us in the last 3 years as a nation, we can see what has happened. The administration came in hellbent on cutting social programs, and was stopped, fortunately, short of the mark. But today they have a new ally. They have the deficit, and with the deficit they will do by indirection what they were unable to do by direction. They will starve out those programs.

The proposal we have before us today draws the line. The MacKay substitute draws that line and says we are going to stop this erosion of domestic programs of America in a fair and specific manner.

I have heard those come and speak before us today, progressive Members on the Democratic side of the aisle, about domestic programs that are to be cut, but they cannot stand on the sidelines and suggest that they do not have their own alternative. They do, and we will consider it, the committee alternative, and we must ask ourselves, in comparison to the freeze substitute, is it fair? The odds are 9 to 1 it is not fair, because for every new dollar that is going to be put in out of our tax bill, $9 goes to defense and $1 to the domestic side. We take the crumbs, we give them the cake, and we call it fairness.

We are drawing the line today on important programs. Surely, I would give more money to some of these domestic programs if I could, but we are about to lose our social legacy in this country if we do not stand up as a party and draw the line and say we are going to control the deficit.

I think this is a responsible position, one that calls for shared sacrifice, and one that this body can support.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida (Mr. MACKAY) has 5 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATTA) has 9 minutes remaining.

Mr. MACKAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. FEIGHAN).

Mr. FEIGHAN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I rise today in support of the MacKay-Nelson substitute because I believe it offers us the best opportunity to deal with the deficits that endanger economic recovery.

In Ohio, the signs of that recovery are not as strong as they are in some other areas of the country. In a sense, we know that we are doing better only because things are not continuing to get worse. High deficits, high interest rates, and another recession, no matter how brief, would be a crippling blow to a regional economy that is still struggling.

This proposal contains three important elements that will allow us to begin the difficult process of reducing the deficit:

First, it freezes domestic discretionary spending. It puts us all on notice that we will have to make the hard choices among programs. It forces us to find ways to make Federal dollars work smarter.

Second, it challenges us to control the so-called uncontrollables in the budget. It requires us to contain the cost of entitlement programs, but it does not punish the people who rely on those programs. It puts a responsible cap on defense spending, and demands that we devise a strategy that meets our national security needs without destroying our economic security.

Third, this proposal begins the process of closing tax loopholes that are nothing more than taxpayer-supported subsidies. When we look at the Federal deficit, we must not pretend that it is a function only of spending. It is a creature of this administration's catering to special interest clienteles as well.

The MacKay substitute represents an important first step in the direction of controlling the deficit. Adoption of this proposal puts us on the path toward a responsible budget policy.

It is not a solution to all of our economic problems. It is not a quick-fix that will create more long-term problems. It will not balance the budget, or cut interest rates, or eliminate the trade deficit overnight. But it is the first step toward those goals. And if we take this first step today, the second, third, and fourth steps all become possible. If we fail today, those steps all remain out of reach.

Mr. MACKAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. AUCOIN).

Mr. AUCOIN. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I stand and urge my colleagues on both sides of the aisle, to support the substitute before us.

I listened to the majority leader, whose views I often share, and I might wish that we could balance the budget or reduce it on the terms he would choose. But we cannot. We cannot extract the budget reductions we need in order to solve the No. 1 economic crisis facing this country—$200 billion deficits—by suddenly transforming all of the priorities in this year. Not in this Congress. Next Congress maybe; but not in this Congress.

What we have to do is to say to conservatives on both sides of the aisle who have come together and taken a step toward us and said that they are willing to concede and give up $140 billion in defense spending, which they do not really want to do, that we, ourselves are equal to the task; that we are willing to bite a little bit into the bullet on the domestic side and match the sacrifice, knowing that in November the country as a whole will decide who is right and who is wrong about the priorities of the last 3 years.

But in the meantime we will keep the problem from growing worse and reduce the deficit by $234 billion.

We will do it on a fair basis. A 3.5-percent increase for defense spending and a 3.5-percent increase for domestic spending is fair. It is fair, and more than that, it prevents the unbalanced and unfair priorities of this administration from getting worse.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. AUCOIN) has expired.

Mr. MACKAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. AUCOIN).

Mr. AUCOIN. Mr. Chairman, more than that, by freezing right now at 3.5 percent, except for Social Security and means tested entitlements, which are allowed to grow beyond 3.5 percent—and let us not kid ourselves about that—by freezing across the board so that the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATTA) has to sacrifice and Members over here have to sacrifice, we will keep the unfair priorities which have been inflicted on this country and have skewered the values of this country over the last few years from getting worse.

I listened to my liberal colleagues, the gentleman from California, Mr. MILLER, who is a dear friend of mine, and the gentleman from California, Mr. WAXMAN, who is also a dear friend of mine. I often agree with those gentlemen, but this time they are wrong. I think we need a budget freeze in place to keep the terrible warp in social priorities and the hemorrhaging red ink from getting worse. And we can do it on an equality-of-sacrifice basis and break this political paralysis that exists where both parties are putting ideology ahead of practical economic common sense. This substitute is the way to do it.

We have reached the point in this debate where each of us must ask ourselves, "Are we going to regain control over our economic future or will we continue this fiscal free fall hoping some small supply side parachute will save us. Do we have the courage to stop the spending spree which threatens the economic security, and quite frankly, the national security, of this Nation. And are we, liberals and conservatives, Republicans and Democrats, going to put aside our own ideological agendas and do what's best for the country?"

We have debated and voted on six substitutes previous to the proposal now pending. Each have been sufficiently flawed and have failed to attract a majority of votes needed to pass.

First we had the President's budget. And in listening to those who have been trying to exonerate the President, I am reminded of the words of candidate Ronald Reagan who in 1980 said:

> Mr. Carter is acting as if he hadn't been in charge for the past 3½ years; as if someone else ran up nearly $200 billion in red ink; as if someone else was responsible for the largest deficit in American history; as if someone else was predicting a budget deficit for this fiscal year of $30 billion or more . . .

If we were facing a $30 billion deficit today, under the MacKay freeze proposal which I am supporting, we would put the budget in surplus by $7.2 billion in the next fiscal year. We would balance the budget and put it into surplus. But that is red ink under the bridge.

We reached the same conclusions with respect to the Dannemeyer amendment and the Roemer amendment, though both reduced the deficit to a considerably greater degree than did the President.

We have now reached the point in the debate where we have to ask ourselves, "What are we going to vote for?" Because if we fail to produce a constructive, fair, and balanced budget which makes a substantial reduction in the projected deficits I believe the American people will rise up in outrage and demand, in effect, that if we cannot do the job, they will find someone who will.

We have heard from those who have said that we cannot reduce the projected increase in military spending because it will jeopardize our national security—that the Russians will bring us to our knees. My constituents are as concerned about external threats to our national security as anyone, but they are terrified of what lies ahead unless we put our fiscal house in order.

What I hear my constituents in Oregon saying is, "Are we in danger because we're not spending enough on the military, or will these monster deficits do us in first?"

As Caspar Weinberger said when he was Director of the Office of Management and Budget, "The identification of a threat to security does not automatically require an expenditure in the defense budget to neutralize it." Were he only to heed his words today.

And one reason I am supporting the MacKay substitute is that it recognizes that we cannot be truly secure from external threats unless we also maintain a strong internal economic foundation. Until we get our fiscal house in order, it allows military spending increases to keep pace with inflation.

And so, I turn to my liberal friends. You might ask why a progressive Democrat should support a proposal which will require $12.4 billion in entitlement savings over the next 3 years. I should point out that this is only $2 billion more than the proposal offered by the Democratic Study Group.

But we have a great opportunity here. We have conservatives, both Republicans and Democrats, who have said, "OK, in the interest of the economic future of this Nation we are willing to give ground on the question of military spending. My constituents might not agree 100 percent, but if they realized that I had an opportunity to take a bold and constructive step toward restoring fiscal sanity, but did not go along because of a narrow parochial concern, they would throw me out on my ear."

And so what I ask of my liberal friends is that you take the same selfless attitude. No one can argue that many of the programs which will be restrained are worthy. No one can argue that under different circumstances many of these programs ought to be increased. But the circumstances are these; unless we control this deficit it doesn't matter whether your world revolves around capital formation or whether your world revolves around programs to help the needy, neither of these things will be possible if service on the national debt becomes the second largest item in the Federal budget.

Now, there are certain commitments which our Government must continue to uphold—to social security recipients or those receiving means tested entitlements such as supplemental security income. And those are exempted from any program reductions under the MacKay substitute. But while we realize savings in Defense by freezing growth, about $140.4 billion over the next 3 years, we must also realize savings in entitlements.

I would like to share with you what my constituents are saying. These are caring individuals. These are individuals who believe the Government ought to help the needy in our society. But here is what a few people from Oregon are telling me: ". . . Everyone I talk to is concerned about the deficit but many seem to think that it is futile to worry about it because too many of our legislators in Washington will do as they are pressured by political party associates rather than deal with the real needs of the country."

"Hold your ground on controlling runaway Government spending or else we all will be locked into a national level of poverty none of us want."

I appeal to my colleagues who consider themselves progressives. If we, who have approached this question with compassion for those less fortunate than ourselves, do not come to grips with this fiscal crisis, the task will be left to those who would gladly eliminate social security, medicare, aid to families with dependent children, food stamps, and low-income housing. And I do not have to draw you a map to show you where those people now reside.

I think there are reasons for both liberals and conservatives to support the MacKay budget proposal. For example, on the revenue side, the MacKay substitute assumes only those revenue increases which are included in the bill recently reported by the Ways and Means Committee. This is also the same level of revenue increase agreed upon by the President and Senate Republicans. Thus the revenue targets in the MacKay substitute are realistic and achieveable.

But most importantly, the MacKay substitute will reduce projected deficits by some $234 billion over the next 3 years. This is $90 billion more than the deficit reduction agreed to by the President and nearly $30 billion more than the reduction proposed in the Republican substitute. This proposal exceeds the Republican deficit reduction effort by an amount which would have balanced the budget in 1977.

And this is where the MacKay proposal earns its salary. The MacKay proposal achieves what the American people have expected us to achieve putting us on a declining path of deficits, easing pressure on interest rates and freeing up a greater portion of our capital saving pool for productive investment.

The proposal I am supporting today meets the crucial tests that most people are demanding: It imposes sacrifice equally, on both entitlements and military spending, it maintains the integrity of essential programs such as Social Security, it helps restore our revenue base, and it makes a substantial reduction in projected deficits.

We simply cannot let this opportunity slip through our fingers. Mr. Majority Leader, with all due respect, this substitute—this budget freeze—deserves our support.

Mr. ERDREICH. Mr. Chairman, I rise today in support of the MacKay amendment. I have been a strong supporter of the original pay-as-you-go budget concept—which would freeze spending at the previous fiscal year's baseline and then provide funding for any increase over the previous year. The original pay-as-you-go budget proposal would freeze all programs across the board and any additional spending would have to be supplied.

In my view, the only budget alternative before us today which comes close to this approach is the MacKay substitute. It does indeed pay for the increases in spending it proposes. It proposes an increase in defense spending and pays for it. It provides full cost-of-living adjustments for social security beneficiaries and pays for it.

The MacKay substitute is not a "business as usual" tax and spend proposal. Of the $47 billion in additional revenue it would mandate through fiscal year 1987, it applies to the retirement of the deficit, not toward additional spending.

In the President's February budget submission, normal revenue growth would increase by some $217.7 billion. This is the amount of money which the Government will generate by fiscal year 1987, over the amount it generated in fiscal year 1984. The MacKay substitute includes $183.8 billion in additional expenditures through fiscal year 1987 over the amount spent in fiscal year 1984. This measure actually proposes to spend less than it takes. A real downpayment on deficit reduction is within this budget.

The defense increase provided for by the MacKay substitute is paid for by the MacKay substitute. The additional areas of spending increases in this substitute are paid for, and the revenue increases are not spent, but are allocated to retiring the national debt. This represents a dramatic departure from the politics of the past and offers us the opportunity to begin to truly reduce the deficits so that our economic recovery will be longlasting and deeper.

If revenue must be allocated to any program, domestic or defense, then let us do that on a pay-as-you-go basis. This plan begins with that premise, and certainly that is the fiscally responsible path for America.

I am not satisfied with some components of this substitute. But this is a start, and a start down the road of fiscal responsibility which we all seek.

● Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Chairman, I remember, as I am sure most of my colleagues do, the sense of hopelessness that most of the country felt as we came into session this past January. It was a feeling that, in an election year, there would not be the political will, in either the Congress, or in the administration, to address the difficult questions of responsible budget deficit reduction that everyone clearly knew must be addressed if the present recovery was not to be prematurely aborted. The signs of what these continually growing deficits would do to our economy were already becoming present: Interest rates that persistently remained, in real terms, at historically high levels; a balance of trade deficit caused primarily by those high interest rates and the resultant artificially overpriced dollar which was causing tremendous disruption in our agricultural exports; continued small business bankruptcies and farm foreclosures which signaled that the recovery was a lopsided one that would fall of its own weight if deficits were not reduced.

As I said, optimism was not high that we would make the hard choices that must be made to avert a budgetary crisis. This pessimism was further fueled by the administration's submission of its proposed budget for fiscal 1985, which called for budget deficits of over $190 billion, and did not address the spending reductions that had to be made to restore some sense of fiscal responsibility.

However, I am glad to be able to say that the pessimism so prevalent just a few months ago appears now to be not totally warranted. The fact that we are here today, discussing seven different budget alternatives which would substantially reduce the projected deficits in the administration's budget. To its credit, the White House itself has now reversed its previous position, and is supporting a significant deficit reduction package, which modestly scales back its unacceptably high proposed defense increases, and provides an additional $48 billion in tax revenues to offset increased defense spending. Whether or not any of us agree with the specifics of that proposal, which we will be voting on later, I feel that we must, at the very least, acknowledge the infusion of reality which the White House has lately injected into its latest revised budget proposal.

This is not to say, of course, that any of the proposals that we have before us today is a path into the promised land of a truly balanced budget. Every one of the proposals that we have before us today still leaves us with unacceptably high deficits. The Dixon proposal gives us the lowest 3-year deficit total, nearly $400 billion, and that is only after actually cutting real spending by defense $64 billion below current levels and raising over $180 billion of new taxes, neither of which is acceptable to me, or to the great majority of Congress. Other packages offer residual planned deficits which range from $150 billion per year to $177 billion per year. Only 4 short years ago, all of us felt that the last Carter budget, which produced a deficit of $40 billion, was totally unacceptable.

However, it is at least encouraging that there is some movement, however less it might be than some of us would prefer, to get our economic house in order. For my own part, I have long advocated at the minimum an across-the-board freeze on all spending, though my preference is actually for a substantial across-the-board 1-year cut in all programs, whether they be domestic or military. It is only in that way, I feel, that true equity can be arrived at in our necessary budgetary pruning. The proposal that comes closest to that goal is the one which will be offered by my colleague from Florida, Mr. MACKAY.

This proposal will reduce the deficit by $234 billion by allowing inflation growth only in the defense budget for the next 3 years, cutting current levels of service in domestic programs by $21 billion below inflation levels, and providing $47 billion in new revenues that have already been accepted by the administration. It is not, as I have said, a true freeze, but of the options available to us today, it comes the closest, and deserves my vote.

Should this freeze amendment fail, I will support the committee proposal which, while it still provides a 3.5-percent real growth for defense and some social net programs, does at least hold all other spending below projected inflation levels, and at least makes a tentative start toward financing the defense increases through an imposition of taxes already agreed to by the administration. Again, my reason for supporting this proposal is that it most fairly spreads the deficit reductions across all programs, absent a real freeze. Everything, with the exception of defense and the safety net programs, is held below the inflation rate, and those increases which do occur are financed through new revenues. After the freeze, this pay-as-you-go concept strikes me as the fairest proposal before us.

As I have said before, the passage of any of these proposals, which have much more in common than they have differences, is only a starting point. We must make sure that our votes on actual appropriations follow the dictates of this budget resolution, and that, next year, we begin the even harder task of making far more substantial deficit reductions than we will do here this year. Passage of any one of these proposals will make a small start back on the long road toward fiscal responsibility. It is my hope that we will have the fortitude to continue that journey in the future.●

● Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, in the Budget Committee markup, I noted against the so-called committee amendment to House Concurrent Resolution 280. I did so because that committee amendment added spending and taxes.

The MacKay amendment is about the same vote. It offers no more guarantee of savings than any of the other alternatives which presented what I would describe as unachievable savings. But it is preferable to what now seems to be the inevitable survivor of this competitor. House Concurrent Resolution 280, as amended.

I do intend to support the Latta substitute as the best vehicle for real achievable deficit reduction. It is not perfect. But it takes us one more step down the reduction trail blazed by the President.

His proposal for the $150 billion downpayment got this exercise started. He will finish it by signing a tax bill only if we have produced reasonable savings. I think we can, that we can even do better, perhaps as much as $200 billion. We need not follow his leadership slavishly, but we must move in his general direction. If not, we are likely to fail.

With my support of the Latta amendment on the record, I shall cast a vote for the MacKay amendment. Its freeze concept takes more out of defense that we will actually approve, but it is a symbol of shared sacrifice. More importantly, it offers a good chance to make minor reductions, about $6 billion, in domestic programs. That is a step in the right direction. It also stays with the generally approved new tax figure of about $48 billion.

So, although it is not my first choice, I will vote for the MacKay amendment.●

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida (Mr. MACKAY) has 2 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATTA) has 9 minutes remaining.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Florida (Mr. MACKAY).

Mr. MACKAY. I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATTA).

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MACKAY. Then, Mr. Chairman, I yield myself the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida (Mr. MACKAY) is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. MACKAY. Mr. Chairman, this debate has framed the issue very well. The debate takes place in the context of a nation that has been through the economic wringer. For the last 3 years there has been, to quote the economist, Schumpeter, "a process of creative destruction going on in the private sector." I do not know how creative it has been, but there has been a great deal of pain, and our Nation is on the verge of emerging leaner, and stronger, and more competitive than it has ever been.

What a cruel irony it will be if, just as all this is taking place in the private sector, and at such great sacrifice, at great sacrifice, we in government refuse to go through that same discipline in the public sector. Think of the irony of our saying—and this is what it seems to me is being said by the opponents of the budget freeze—that we can only achieve fairness by increasing spending.

I believe we have a responsibility. The responsibility is in the Congress. The way to do what we have got to do is the same way we do it in our families, the same way we do it in our businesses. It is to freeze expenditures across the board. It is to use any new revenues we can find to stabilize our situation by reducing our debt load.

After that has been done, and our continued economic recovery has been assured, then we can start the difficult long-term task of developing a balanced and coherent fiscal policy in this country. One that makes sense and one that is fair.

Mr. Chairman, I believe if we do that, once again we will find government in America being a part of the solution, instead of a part of the problem.

● Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I support the MacKay/Nelson substitute budget amendment. It provides for one of the largest deficit reduction plans of any of the major budget proposals before us, and it achieves the 3-year, $234 billion deficit reduction largely through savings in the military spending and lower interest payments on the debt.

This plan calls for zero real growth in defense spending which has already increased from $135 billion in fiscal year 1980 to $237 billion in the current fiscal year. I have supported the effort to strengthen our Armed Forces which had fallen to a dangerously low level of preparedness when the present administration took office. Much has been accomplished in the past 3 years to restore the effectiveness and credibility of our defense forces, and I am convinced that it is now time to recognize that we are facing a budgetary crisis of such proportions that the rapid growth of the defense budget of the past several years is no longer affordable.

The MacKay-Nelson substitute provides for modest savings in entitlements—$12.4 billion over 3 years—and in nondefense discretionary spending—$6.7 billion over 3 years. These are the budget areas which have been called upon for the greatest measure of restraint and savings in recent years, and we should not continue to look to them for the lion's share of sacrifice. At the same time, reasonable administrative and financing reforms of massive health and welfare programs, I am convinced, can be found to yield the relatively small savings in domestic spending the MacKay-Nelson budget would require. It is barely $5 billion more than the House's own Budget Committee proposal requires to be saved on domestic spending in the next 3 years.

MacKay-Nelson is a budget framework that makes sense at this time and I will vote in favor of it.●

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida (Mr. MACKAY) has expired.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATTA).

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from Florida (Mr. MACKAY).

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. NELSON of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 108, noes 310, not voting 14, as follows:

[Roll No. 72]

RECONCILIATION

SEC. 2. (a) Not later than May 1, 1984, the House committees named in subsections (b) through (i)(1) of this section shall submit their recommendations to the House Budget Committee. After receiving those recommendations, the Committee on the Budget shall report to the House a reconciliation bill or resolution or both carrying out all such recommendations without any substantive revision.

(b) The House Committee on Agriculture shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to increase budget authority by $691,000,000 and outlays by $691,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of budget authority by $1,017,000,000 and outlays by $1,017,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of budget authority by $3,459,000,000 and outlays by $3,459,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(c) The House Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce outlays by $1,000,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of outlays by $0 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of outlays by $0 in fiscal year 1987.

(d) The House Committee on Energy and Commerce shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority by $1,031,000,000 and outlays by $1,031,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of budget authority by $1,403,000,000 and outlays by $1,403,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of budget authority by $1,721,000,000 and outlays by $1,721,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(e) The House Committee on Education and Labor shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority by $194,000,000 and outlays by $337,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of budget authority by $317,000,000 and outlays by $514,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; and requires decreases of budget authority by $449,000,000 and outlays by $678,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(f) The House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provides spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority by $42,000,000 and outlays by $2,020,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of budget authority by $444,000,000 and outlays by $1,612,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of budget authority by $579,000,000 and outlays by $2,188,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(g) The House Committee on small business shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee sufficient to reduce outlays by $213,000,000 in fiscal year 1985: further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of $162,000,000 in budget authority and $242,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of $258,000,000 in budget authority and $222,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1987.

(h) The House Committee on Ways and Means shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority by $2,188,000,000 and outlays by $3,023,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of budget authority by $2,714,000,000 and outlays by $3,589,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of budget authority by $3,151,000,000 and outlays by $4,043,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(i) The House Committee on Ways and Means shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee sufficient to increases revenues by $9,200,000,000 in fiscal years 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires increases of $16,700,000,000 in revenues in fiscal year 1986; and requires increases of $21,300,000,000 in revenues in fiscal year 1987.

SEC. 2. It is the sense of the Congress that, in order to assure the funding necessary for a strong defense, the House Committee on Armed Services and the House Committee on Appropriations should report to the Congress bills providing authorizations for appropriations and appropriations for defense and defense-related activities for the two-fiscal year period beginning on October 1, 1984. It is further the sense of the Congress that the House Committee on Rules should report legislation permanently enacting a requirement for a biennial defense budget, or to effect a similar requirememt for the Rules of the House of Representatives.

SEC. 3. It is the sense of the Congress that the $4 billion in savings to be achieved from reductions in medicare outlays shall not come from provisions which increase costs to beneficiaries or reduce services provided to beneficiaries. It is further the sense of Congress that a hospital shall not be obligated to obtain signed agreements from each doctor on its medical staff, who provides inpatient services in the hospital, stating that the physician agrees to accept assignment for any medicare beneficiary that he treats as an inpatient of that hospital.

SEC. 4. (a) After the Congress has completed action on the first concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1985, it shall not be in order in either the House of Representatives or the Senate to consider a bill, resolution, or amendment providing authority for—

(1) new direct loan obligations for fiscal year 1985;

(2) new primary loan guarantee commitments for fiscal year 1985; or

(3) new secondary loan guarantee commitments for fiscal year 1985, or any conference report on any such bill or resolution, if—

(A) the enactment of such bill or resolution as reported;

(B) the adoption and enactment of such amendment; or

(C) the enactment of such bill or resolution in the form recommended in such conference report; would cause the appropriate level of total new direct loan obligations for fiscal year 1985, total new primary loan guarantee commitments for such fiscal year, or total new secondary loan guarantee commitments for such fiscal year set forth in such concurrent resolution on the budget to be exceeded.

(b)(1) The joint explanatory statement accompanying the conference report on this resolution shall include an estimated allocation, based upon the first section of this resolution as recommended in such conference report, of the appropriate levels of total new direct loan obligations, new primary loan guarantee commitments, and new secondary loan guarantee commitments authority among each committee of the House of Representatives and the Senate which has jurisdiction over bills and resolutions providing such new authority.

(2) As soon as practicable after this resolution is agreed to every committee of each House, after consulting with the committee or committees of the other House to which the committee or committees of the other House to which all or part of the allocation has been made, subdivide among its subcommittees the allocation of new direct loan obligations, new primary loan guarantee commitments allocated to it in the joint explanatory statement accompanying the conference report on this resolution.

(c) This section shall not be applicable to agricultural price support and related programs of the type in operation on January 1, 1984, that are funded through the Commodity Credit Corporation.

SEC. 5. It is the sense of the Congress that amounts of loans guaranteed, or loan assets sold by a Federal agency, which are financed by the Federal Financing Bank, should be recorded in the unified budget as outlays of the issuing agency. Any budget authority used by the Federal Financing Bank for such transactions shall be attributed to the appropriate Federal agency.

ADMINISTRATIVE SAVINGS

SEC. 6. It is the sense of the Congress that the Executive Branch achieve at least $28 billion in savings over fiscal years 1985 through 1987 by implementing those recommendations of the President's Private Sector Survey on Cost Control requiring administrative action within that branch of Government. It is further the sense of the Congress that the President shall report to Congress each year, in conjunction with the annual budget submission, on the progress made in achieving the savings required by this section.

AUTOMATIC SECOND BUDGET RESOLUTION

SEC. 7. If Congress has not completed action by October 1, 1984, on the concurrent resolution on the budget required to be reported under section 310(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 for the 1985 fiscal year, then this concurrent resolution shall be deemed to be the concurrent resolution required to be reported under section 310(a) of such Act, for the purposes of the prohibitions contained in section 311 of such Act.

SECTION 302(b) FILING REQUIREMENT

SEC. 8. (a) It shall not be in order in the House of Representatives to consider any bill or resolution, or amendment thereto, providing—

(1) new budget authority for fiscal year 1985;

(2) new spending authority described in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act first effective in fiscal year 1985; or

(3) direct loan authority, primary loan guarantee authority, or secondary loan guarantee authority for fiscal year 1985;

within the jurisdiction of any committee which has received an allocation pursuant to section 302(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of discretionary budget authority or new spending authority, as described above, for such fiscal year, unless and until such committee makes the allocation or subdivisions required by section 302(b) of the Congressional Budget Act, in connection with the most recently agreed to concurrent resolution on the budget.

(b) The prohibition contained in subsection (a) shall not apply until twenty-one days of continuous session, as defined in section 1011(5) of the Impoundment Control Act of 1974, after Congress completes action on the concurrent resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to House Resolution 476, the amendment is considered as having been read.

The gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATTA) will be recognized for 1 hour, and a Member opposed will be recognized for 1 hour.

The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATTA).

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that everyone will have to agree that the last day we have had a pretty good discussion of the budget. We have had all different types of proposals being voted on.

We have had some that would have increased taxes as high as $181 billion. We have had some that would increase taxes by $6.7 billion. And I refer to over a 3-year period. We have had some that would increase taxes midway, something like $76.2 billion. We had a substitute offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. JONES) which would increase taxes by $49.8 billion; and our substitute, which increases taxes by $47.2 billion.

We have been all over the place as far as defense reductions are concerned. We have had one proposal that would have shutdown the defense establishment, I am sure, completely, by reducing expenditures for the defense establishment by $202 billion.

We have had all types of figures bandied about as to how much the deficit could be reduced through these various methods that have been proposed.

But I think seriously we have two proposals yet to be decided upon here in the House, and there is some similarity between these proposals as far as increased revenues are concerned.

The proposal by the majority on the Budget Committee would increase revenues by 49.8 percent, and our proposal would increase revenues by 47.2 percent. Where the real variance between these two proposals takes place is in the area of defense.

In the majority House Budget Committee, House Concurrent Resolution 280, there would be a reduction over 3 years in defense by $95.7 billion and in our proposal it is $40.2 billion.

As far as the deficit is concerned in House Concurrent Resolution 280, the majority resolution, the deficit reduction would be $181.7 billion over 3 years and ours would go to $204.9 billion.

Let me say as far as our proposal is concerned that the White House does support this. It is consistent with what the objectives of the White House have been. I am pleased to offer it as our substitute here this afternoon.

As I mentioned, it will reduce the deficit by $204.9 billion over 3 years.

Let me say, Mr. Chairman, this plan is real, it is fair, it is workable, it is doable, and would not jeopardize the security interests of the United States.

□ 1540

It certainly would not increase the tax burden on many of our Americans and certainly not on the average taxpayer, because we would not be doing anything to the individual income tax rates, we would not be doing anything on indexing. We would merely be doing about the same thing as the Democrat package that is left before us. Our reduction package strikes a balance by slowing growth in defense, entitlements, and nondefense discretionary spending programs, while simultaneously following through on management initiatives recommended by the Grace Commission as examined by CBO and GAO.

I have brought forth the Grace Commission recommendations here so some of the Members who have never even seen them might see them from the outside because here is a real good piece of work. If you go through those pages, there are about $400 billion worth of proposed savings that could be made in this Government.

Let me point out that I used the word "balanced" because this is a balanced package. It is a rational approach, it is a fair plan that warrants the support of every person willing to put aside narrow minded partisan issues in favor of the national interest.

The President has set an example for all of us by giving his wholehearted support to this plan in his desire to bring these deficits under control, even though it means compromising with the Congress in certain areas on which he feels very strongly.

There are three major components of our deficit reduction package; defense cuts account for 20 percent, domestic 24 percent, and revenue increases account for 23 percent of the total reduction we propose to make.

The Democrat package, on the other hand, defense cuts account for 53 percent of the total deficit reductions, revenue increases are 27 percent; while noninterest domestic spending accounts for a paltry 14 percent of their total savings.

Clearly, defense funds under their proposal would be bearing the lion's share of the burden in the Democrats' plan where almost no effort is made to come to grips with the most rapidly growing components of domestic spending.

Let us just say for a moment that it bothers me to see us dividing partisanly on this question of security of the United States, because I still believe that we as individuals believe that this is our country and it is worth protecting.

I just happen to believe that we have to do what is necessary to protect the best interests of this country; whether we are interested in partianship or not. Our first interest should be the United States of America. And I do not want to spend one single red copper cent more for any program, including defense, than is absolutely necessary.

But merely to have people who know nothing about the defense programs of this country, to pick out figures here and there and say we ought to take this amount out of defense because it might help their program that they might be particularly interested in, in the domestic area to survive some minor cuts, seems quite ridiculous to me.

Hopefully this afternoon we can join together as Americans for the defense of this country and not go as deep as is proposed by the Democrat budget in the security functions of this country.

Let me say the GOP plan is balanced in another more fundamental sense; in that it maintains essential priorities of the Reagan administration for which it was given a mandate by the American people in 1980. These priorities are the restoration and maintenance of an adequate defense, the creation of a tax system both less burdensome and more economically efficient, the reduction in the overall rate of growth of Government spending and deficits.

We think the budget that we propose contributes to these goals more than any other of the plans that have been offered. Our plan, by offering a 3-year deficit reduction of $204.9 billion, actually surpasses the House Democratic leadership's goal of $200 billion as enunciated in the recent bipartisan negotiations on reducing the budget which took place in the White House.

I trust that the majority leader will vote for our plan since the Jones budget does not meet that $200 billion goal publicized by Mr. WRIGHT a few weeks back as his goal. We also invite the Democratic rank and file to join Republicans in supporting this real deficit-cutting plan.

In our deliberations on the first concurrent budget resolution, we should pause to note that we are in the midst of an economic recovery in this country that is both robust and better balanced than anyone dreamed possible only a year ago.

All major sectors of the economy, consumer spending, capital goods, and housing are advancing rapidly. Industrial output overall has risen 18.5 percent since the beginning of the recovery. That is faster than the average for the equivalent phase of other recovery periods since World War II.

Actually, it is beginning to resemble the longstanding recovery that began in 1961.

Let us not forget in this debate that both the bigger recovery and the balance of the current recovery can be attributed to the economic policies implemented by the administration and the Congress since 1981, a policy which will continue in the deficit reduction plan that we propose this afternoon.

Especially, it must not be overlooked that we have stabilized the overall Federal tax budget near the 19 percent of the gross national product of the 1960's and 1970's.

In the late 1970's under the tax-and-spend policies of the past, it was rising to economically unstable levels. It should also be recalled that we restored a better balance between defense and nondefense spending.

And that modernization of our defense capability, so neglected in the last decade, is a key factor in the current economic expansion of this country.

There are other important points about our budget I want to draw to your attention. It is the only deficit reduction plan remaining which puts the deficit on a downward path through 1987 without major tax increases.

While the deficit would decrease by about $6 billion between 1986 and 1987, under our plan, it will actually increase by almost $10 billion under the House Democrat leadership proposals.

For example, in 1985, under this deficit reduction plan, the deficit for 1985 would be $174.6 billion; the Democrat reduction plan, $175.4; and in 1986 under the GOP plan, $169.2 billion; under the Democrat plan, $172.3 billion in deficits; and in 1987, under the GOP plan, the deficit would be $163.4 and under the Democrat plan, $182.0.

What we have not yet succeeded in doing is to check the overall growth of Government spending which under the current policy, according to CBO, will rise from 23.9 of gross national product in 1984 to 24.9 percent in 1989.

A key to restraining Government spending and deficits while maintaining the improved balance of defense to nondefense spending is to reduce the growth in those areas of domestic spending that are sill growing too rapidly.

That is the problem which our plan addresses. And the Jones plan does not.

The Jones plan would reverse the sound fiscal policy mix the President has steered us on since 1981. The components of our 3 year, $204.9 billion deficit reduction plan are as follows: $47.2 billion for the tax reform package reconciled; $23.2 billion from a reconciled entitlement mandatory and savings; $40.2 billion in defense reductions, $26.3 billion primarily in a freeze on nondefense, discretionary budget authority, and $28.1 billion from the Grace Commission recommendations, $16.4 billion from the market plan and user's fees and $23.5 billion from interest savings.

Now let us look at what the House Republican leadership plan does and what the House Democrat leadership plan does. For every dollar saved in entitlements our plan cuts $1.73 from defense, and for every dollar saved on nondefense discretionary spending, the Republican plan saves $1.53 in defense. But the Democratic leadership plan is so unbalanced that it pares more than $6 from the defense budget for every dollar cut in entitlements and nondefense spending combined.

While domestic spending comprises about 70 percent of the total Federal budget, the Democratic leadership reduction plan offers only a minute 0.6-percent cut in noninterest domestic spending.

While the Democrats claim that domestic spending cuts are $39.7 billion over 3 years, $22 billion would come from interest savings. I did not realize that interest savings was in the category of domestic spending. I thought it was a payment on the debt, but nevertheless, they claim that is a domestic spending cut.

In reality this means they are recommending only $18.2 billion in 3-year domestic cuts out of a spending base of over $3 trillion over the next 3 years. Now that is not much savings.

While our package has $72.4 billion in reconciled deficit reductions, the House Democrat leaders' plan has only $59 billion. Since only reconciled savings can be guaranteed, the financial markets will react more positively to our plan.

The revenue increases, the $47.2 billion assumed in our plan, are the Joint Committee on Taxation's 1985–87 estimate of the Ways and Means tax bill (H.R. 4170). It is the intent of our plan to arrive at the assumed revenue totals by choosing elements from both the Ways and Means Committee bill and what will come out of our conference. We believe that in general these will be provisions of the Ways and Means Committee bill.

We see a total savings from entitlements of $23.2 billion, by focusing on continued efforts to improve administration of domestic programs, at the same time ensuring ongoing commitment to provide better delivery of services to the needy. Our plan leaves intact the basic benefit structure of the Federal retirement programs, which include Social Security, military and civilian retirement, railroad retirement, veterans benefit entitlement programs, and so forth.

A reassuring word about Social Security. No cuts in benefits to individuals under Social Security are proposed. Due to our aggregate discretionary freeze, there is an assumed $675 million reduction in Social Security and Medicare function from the CBO baseline in the administration of these two programs. These savings are not in the entitlement programs contrary to the misleading factsheet on our plan produced by the House Budget Committee core staff.

The Republican budget does not assume any benefit cuts or specific administrative cuts in Social Security or Medicare.

To conclude my discussion of the entitlement savings in the House GOP plan, let me reiterate that many of the major entitlement savings in our budget are also included in the Democrat plan. Among them are the farm price support freeze, SBA disaster loans, the half-COLA for Federal retirees, and a provision relating to the Pension Benefit Guarantee Corporation.

Defense spending in our plan provides for real growth averaging 5.6 percent over 3 years, using CBO deflators, compared to 2.1 percent real growth in the House Democratic leadership plan.

The House Democratic leadership has chosen once again to ignore the advice of our military experts on this particular function. The House Democrat real growth in defense actually provides lower funding levels for fiscal years 1985 and 1986, to be exact, $35.6 billion less, than was contained in the last Carter budget, which was overwhelmingly rejected by both Democrats and Republicans alike as being inadequate.

Not only does this House Democrat plan provide less for defense than the last Carter budget, this year's Democrat budget for defense cuts even further than last year's budget which was passed by this House, knocking out an additional $12.2 billion in BA and $8.9 billion in outlays over 2 years, 1985 and 1986.

Can we really afford to play these kinds of political games with the security of our Nation? Are we really willing to seriously consider these kinds of cuts in defense spending and run the risk of undermining efforts that are now being made to build up our defense program?

Do we really want to send the wrong kind of a signal to our European allies now fighting to support and maintain the NATO alliance in the face of vocal minorities who advocate unilateral disarmament?

It is this ongoing roller coaster approach to defense spending on the part of our Democratic friends that has left us no choice but to call for 2-year budgeting for defense. In our budget, appropriation and authorizing committees are directed to report out 2-year defense spending bills in an effort to bring about much needed stability.

Our budget calls for 1-year enforcement for discretionary spending with the freeze policy reviewed each year in the light of economic conditions, and the growth or decline of the deficit. The second and third years of the freeze are contingent on the actual course of the deficits.

Unlike the House Democrat plan which calls for a modified discretionary freeze but allows spending increases in excess of 3.5 percent, ours is a bona fide freeze, an aggregate cap on nondefense discretionary appropriations for fiscal year 1985.

Our plan commits the administration to $28.1 billion in management savings from the Grace Commission recommendations, compared to only $2 billion in savings under the Democrat plan. Imagine that, they could only come up with $2 billion in savings over 3 years of all of these proposals under the Grace Commission. And there are over $400 billion worth of recommendations contained in those documents.

We also propose savings of $6.6 billion from enactment of new or expanded user fees, long discussed but not adopted by this House.

Under another proposal in our plan the loan portfolio of the Federal Government would gradually be sold to private investors.

Our budget assumes a conservative $10 billion reduction over the next 3 years, a modest first step in addressing a spiraling Federal credit subsidy.

Lastly, our plan anticipates a savings of $23.5 billion over 3 years in interest alone.

So, Mr. Chairman, I think that the Republican alternative is much, much better than what we have left to vote on this afternoon and I have reference to the Democrat substitute.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. JONES) is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. MILLER).

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, now that we have disposed of most of the amendments to the committee resolution I would hope that we would also reject the Latta substitute and support the committee resolution. The committee resolution provides for a bold and a nonpartisan step toward the reduction of the deficits in an effective and responsible manner.

□ 1600

This resolution incorporates the pay-as-you-go provisions that I have discussed in this House now for several years. While it is not as tough as I had originally proposed or recommended, it does deny Congress the ability to make irresponsible spending decisions and to charge the cost of those decisions off to future generations by prohibiting the use of the deficit to finance new spending decisions.

The President and Republicans, for all of their rhetoric about increased deficits and their desires to reduce them have created the largest deficits in history. The debate in his House, over the last 2 days, illustrates that they have no plan to control that spending except by slashing programs for the poorest and the weakest of American citizens.

The President warned in his inaugural address, "For decades we have piled deficit upon deficit, mortgaging our future and our children's future for the temporary convenience of the present." And since then what have we seen? We have seen radical tax cuts that we are now told in the morning papers benefit the rich and hurt the poor. We have seen tens of billions of dollars cut from the weakest and the poorest, the most vulnerable of our citizens. And we have seen the most rapid peacetime military buildup in history.

Congress has followed that blueprint for 3 years, and in those 3 years we have added $1.1 trillion in new debt, $300 billion more than all of the debt created in administrations from George Washington to Jimmy Carter.

The President and his allies in Congress have said that this is the pattern that we should continue. But, staying the course has been the most expensive decision that this Congress has made.

The President sought in the budget he sent to us, which received one vote in this House yesterday, $9 billion in cuts from the neediest citizens. Forty percent of all of the budget cuts recommended by the President would come from the programs which help the poorest of our people.

This is the President who said "our children come first." They apparently come first everywhere except in the President's budget, because he slashes a quarter of a billion dollars from child nutrition, he throws a half million high-risk pregnant women and infants off of the supplemental feeding program, he cuts housing to the elderly and to the handicapped. And these programs have been cut consistently since 1981.

But what else do we find? He proposes a $47 billion buildup in defense. A defense budget costing taxpayers $700 million a day. And how does he plan to finance this? Through the deficit.

It is obvious that if we continue the Reagan approach, if we continue the Republican approach, the deficits will continue to mount. That is what CBO has told us as well as others who have looked at their approach.

I say it is time that we go forward with the pay-as-you-go budget. Two years ago I first offered this budget to this committee, and it was rejected. You stayed with the Reagan approach, and we have seen the pileup in the deficits.

Two years ago I said that "the American people do not expect miracles but they do expect the truth. The American people are expecting more from this Congress than the partisan brick throwing. They want answers, and they want us to give them answers in a new process." Today, in this House, the time has come to let that new process begin.

The committee resolution allows for less than inflation increases across the board. It does not cut the basic support programs for the elderly and the poor. But it does it cut $37 billion from current domestic levels, including entitlements, and $95 billion from the defense budget. It allows no new spending in categories unless we are prepared to raise the revenues or provide for offsetting cuts in other areas of the budget.

If we follow this discipline, we will reduce the deficit over the next 3 years by $182 billion.

For 2 years I have heard Members of this Congress talk about the enthusiasm of their constituents for the pay-as-you-go process. They have explained it in their newsletters, in their town meetings and during campaigns, and their constituents have welcomed this approach. But the test is not just whether we have the pay-as-you-go budget for this fiscal year; the test is whether the Congress will have the courage and the will to continue the pay-as-you-go approach after the easy tax dollars are gone, after the loopholes are closed and we must confront the real priority setting decisions that is required of us as Members of Congress.

Mr. Chairman, the time for a responsible budget process has, at long last, arrived.

The time for controlling our spending appetites has arrived.

The time for paying for our spending decisions has arrived.

And the time for making a serious, long-term commitment to reducing the deficit which is eroding our national economic strength and imperiling our recovery has arrived.

Mr. Chairman, the time for the pay-as-you-go budget has come, and I urge this House to reject the Latta substitute and put this Congress and this Nation on a course of fiscal responsibility.

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 6 minutes.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAMM. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Latta amendment to the 1985 budget resolution.

The debate today is reminiscent of a special order discussion many of us held here on the House floor some 6 months ago warning the Congress of the dangers of our skyrocketing budget deficits. The danger remains the same—the specter of an unprecedented stream of $200 billion deficits as far as the eye can see. These deficits are unprecedented, not only because of their magnitude, but because of the very real possibility that they will increase—or at least not decrease—during a time of improved economic conditions. As such, they cannot be rationalized as a natural response to an economic downturn.

The negative impact of these deficits also remains the same. Large Federal borrowing restricts the amount of investment capital available to businesses and individuals, and ultimately leads to higher interest rates. One only has to look at our record trade deficits and the resulting loss of millions of American jobs to see the tangible effect of unacceptably high interest rates on the economy. In Washington State, where the economy is particularly dependent on interest sensitive industries such as forest products, agriculture, and commercial aircraft industries, the impact is particularly devastating. There can be only one conclusion: Failure by the Congress to act on the deficit crisis can only lead to an increase in interest rates, a loss of the hard fought and costly gains against inflation, and an end to the fragile economic recovery we are currently experiencing.

Finally, the solution remains the same. What continues to be necessary is an across-the-boards commitment to seek responsible and sensitive spending restraint in all areas of the budget—including entitlement, domestic discretionary, and defense program—and to couple this with reasonable revenue-raising legislation directed at closing loopholes rather than further burdening the already burdensome tax load of average Americans.

I believe that the Latta amendment is an important first step toward achieving this goal. The amendment envisions:

A significant reduction in the President's original defense request which still allows necessary growth for major weapons system modernization,

A thorough review of entitlement programs with preliminary approaches to getting health care costs under control,

A freeze of domestic discretionary programs for 3 years, if justified by deficit considerations, which will help encourage a prioritizing process by the Congress with regard to Federal discretionary programs,

A commitment to achieving substantial savings identified by the Grace Commission—the first detailed management initiatives in recent budget resolutions which also have administration backing and,

The adoption of a reasonable package of tax reforms to generate necessary additional revenues.

Most importantly, of all the proposals presented by the administration and House and Senate leadership, it is the largest and most comprehensive budget deficit reduction program. A product of long and tireless discussions by the Republican House leadership, it provides a dollar yardstick by which all other proposals can be measured.

Like all compromises, I am, of course, not in agreement with all its provisions. In the defense budget, for example, I believe further reductions may be prudent without hindering necessary modernization programs by the Pentagon. Recent reports concerning waste in the Defense Department strongly suggest this possibility. Nevertheless, as a total package, the Latta amendment provides an appropriate framework for further discussions and negotiation and deserves the support of the Congress as we begin the long process of bringing about the return to a sane Federal fiscal policy.

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. Chairman, 3 years ago we adopted a budget resolution in the House called the Gramm-Latta budget that first implemented the Reagan economic program. It set out a 3-year program of tight purse-strings, new priorities, and tax relief. During the first year of Gramm-Latta we got 90 percent of the savings we had sought, we slowed the growth of nondefense discretionary spending and we slowed the growth of means-tested entitlements as a percentage of GNP, which had tripled in 20 years.

We laid the cornerstone for an economic recovery which has reduced the inflation rate from the highest levels in American history to the lowest levels in two decades. We planted the seeds of growth that have produced 5 million new jobs for our people—more permanent, productive taxpaying jobs in the private sector than this Congress has created in the past 10 years through make-work, dead-end Government jobs.

Unfortunately, while we had success in the first year of our budget, during the second year—an election year—we rejected phase 2. The President accepted new taxes, and for that concession the Congress committed to achieve $3 in budget savings for every dollar of new taxes. But we delivered only 57 cents of that promised $3 in budget savings—a paltry 40 percent of our original agreement.

Last year the majority party in their House—in what they called the Democratic recovery plan—proposed raising taxes, slashing defense, and increasing the deficit so they could go on spending as usual. They ridiculed the Reagan budget, but they ended up with a bigger deficit and with more special interest spending. Now they come to us with a "pay-as-you-go" budget.

Now, I think we are stretching the truth a little bit too much. We are debasing the English language by calling a $175 billion deficit "pay-as-you-go." I do not think anybody in this country uses the language that way except us.

We talk about "shared sacrifice." Well, let me talk about the sharing of the sacrifice. First of all, the Democrats propose $10 billion in entitlement savings. The only problem is we have already passed $7 billion of that in the House. They propose $450 million—not billion—in savings on non-defense discretionary spending. But when CBO reestimates that figure, they are actually raising non-defense discretionary spending.

So if you look at what is actually happening, what they propose changing, this budget achieves less than $4 billion of real savings over 3 years in entitlements and non-defense discretionary spending.

Now, in the name of "shared sacrifice" they ask that we raise 12 times as much—by $49.4 billion. In the name of "shared sacrifice" they ask that we cut defense 24 times as much—by $95.6 billion.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this budget has nothing to do with "pay-as-you-go." It has nothing to do with "shared sacrifice." It is another budget that proposes raising taxes, slashing defense and continuing to spend. It asks ever element of our society to share sacrifice except the Government, and the clients of this Government—the people who are riding in the wagon and complaining that the cushions are not thick enough—while at the same time the people who are pulling the wagon must bear a heavier burden.

I rise to support the Latta substitute, which proposes to raise taxes by $2 billion less than the Democratic alternative. So, if you are like me and are opposed to raising taxes, that is not a reason to vote against the Latta substitute. In fact, if it fails, you are voting to stay with a package that raises taxes even more.

I support the Latta substitute because it puts the bulk of the emphasis where it belongs: Domestic spending, which the Grace Commission proposal tries to reform by improving the efficiency of this Government.

I urge my colleagues to vote aye on the Latta budget substitute, and in doing so, vote to raise taxes less, vote to cut defense less and vote to put more of the burden where it belongs and where the American people want it: on the Government itself—by controlling nondefense spending, by reforming entitlements and by putting the Federal Government on a budget like everybody else.

I know many of my colleagues on my side of the aisle do not want to raise taxes, and I do not either. But in voting for the Latta substitute I am not voting to raise taxes; I am voting to go forward with a better package than the Democratic package.

So, if you are opposed to raising taxes in order to let the Government go on spending as usual, vote "aye" on the Latta budget and reduce the tax increase. If you are opposed to slashing defense, vote aye on the Latta budget to reduce the cuts in defense. And, finally, if you propose controlling spending—if that is where you think the problem is, as I do—then I urge you to vote for the Latta budget so that we might put more of the burden on the real culprit in runaway Federal spending and deficits: on the Government itself.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAMM. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I want to commend the gentleman on his statement. I think it is very eloquent and explains exactly what this is all about.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the Latta substitute.

It is the most responsible alternative.

I would like to point out that we are deliberating this resolution in the midst of one of the strongest economic recoveries our Nation has ever witnessed. Inflation has dropped dramatically from 12.4 percent to about 4 percent, along with interest rates which have plunged from 21.5 percent to 11.5 percent today. In addition, the gross national product (GNP) has surged to rates even the most optimistic economists did not expect. Furthermore, even though unemployment is still unacceptably high, nearly 5 million jobs have been created in the last year and a half with a record number of Americans now at work. I could go on and on about the positive indications of the strength of the recovery—factory orders, automobile sales, housing starts, retail sales—but the point is that no one can dispute that an amazingly strong recovery exists.

Now we must ask ourselves why the economy has jumped by leaps and bounds. There is no question that this administration's economic policies, including the tax cuts, have created the recovery. These policies have put our economy on sound footing and alleviated the onerous tax burdens on the taxpayers. By stabilizing the Federal tax levels, which were previously soaring to finance the explosive growth in entitlement programs, we have succeeded in achieving a broad-based economic expansion.

Yet, we are here today debating a resolution which would reverse the economic policies which have brought us through recession and into an era of strong economic growth. The Democrats were quick to point fingers before the administration's policies began to work; but now that they have proved themselves, the Democrats are determined to change course which will destroy the recovery mid-stream. They cry "deficits, deficits," but yet this resolution does nothing to assist in meaningful long-term deficit reduction. It still allows inordinate growth in nearly all areas other than defense. Defense, on the other hand, is slashed tremendously in order to, as the other side of the aisle claims, reduce the deficit. One wonders, though, why this area which has been neglected for so many years, must now bear the brunt of this body's actions to reduce the deficit. If one examines the figures closely, one would quickly realize the contributions to economic growth made by modernizing our defense capability. One would also realize that the deficits were not created by massive defense spending, but through years and years of soaring growth in other spending. While cuts must be made in defense, they must be made carefully so as not to threaten our national security.

In addition, the resolution assumes the enactment of new tax increases to provide for additional spending which, as we all know, will stifle the recovery.

There is no doubt that we desperately need to reduce the deficit, but not by killing the recovery and by unduly compromising our national security. We must provide incentives for further economic expansion and curb the growth in overall Federal spending through the implementation of better management practices aimed at eliminating waste and abuse, such as the Grace Commission recommendations. We must continue these policies which have already succeeded in reducing the deficit by about $22 billion below the official forecast. Tax increases and increased domestic spending, as proposed by this resolution, will undercut the strength of the recovery which will, in the long run, increase, rather than decrease, the deficit.

Mr. Chairman, higher tax increases on the working people of this Nation to provide for increased spending will not solve our budget problems, nor will lowering our defense shield. We have already paid enough for the years of free spending and high inflation. This resolution is a sham and a blueprint for disaster. Let us get serious about reducing the deficit by going to the heart of the problem—Government spending. Let us pass a budget plan that will not jeopardize our national security and will allow for continued economic growth. Let us defeat this resolution and adopt the GOP leadership budget.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. GRADISON).

Mr. GRADISON. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the Latta substitute. It is clearly the best alternative before us because it strikes a proper balance between revenues, defense, and domestic spending.

This balance is crucial because it is the essence of fairness. We must be realistic; the committee-sponsored resolution is lopsided with regard to defense and domestic spending. That proposal may pass this body, but has little chance of surviving a conference with the other body. Perhaps more importantly, it has no chance of being implemented.

Let us not kid ourselves. Let us give the public credit for knowing what we do. We fool only ourselves if we think adoption of an unrealistic and lopsided budget resolution, unacceptable to the Senate, an anathema to the President, can accomplish anything more than convince the American people, and U.S. capital, and financial markets of our unwillingness to put our fiscal policy house in order.

Mr. Chairman, at this time I would like to take a few minutes to explain one of the provisions of the Latta substitute that has created considerable interest—the so-called market plan. I recently introduced H.R. 5288, the Credit Accounting Reform Act of 1984, which would implement the market plan. Because the Latta substitute assumes a modest first step toward implementation of the market plan, I take this opportunity to explain what it is and how it would work.

The budget of the Federal Government ought to show all programs of the Government, and reflect accurately the costs of those programs. Unfortunately, it does neither.

The first shortcoming means that the budget of the United States is not comprehensive; some programs and activities are excluded from it by law. In 1984, for example, more than $16 billion—nearly 10 percent of the official budget deficit—falls in the category of off budget spending.

The second shortcoming means that the true costs of many programs are misstated in the budget, or not stated at all. This problem arises with credit programs, such as direct loans and loan guarantees, which have grown even faster than the budget itself. Today, there are 424 separate Federal credit programs, and the Congressional Budget Office [CBO] estimates that the cost of Federal credit assistance is understated in the budget by $20 billion.

All Federal direct loans—operating from 281 separate programs—are subsidized, which is to say they are made on conditions more favorable than are commercial loans—generally, lower interest rates, longer terms, and more generous grace periods. Yet, because even subsidized loans usually have an anticipated repayment stream over time, Government spending for loans is not exhaustive; some or all of the original outlay for the loan returns, with interest, in the form of repayments.

Current budget practice records direct loans as net lending—the difference between the amount of the loans made and repayments from previously made loans. The true cost of a Government-subsidized loan is the subsidy value—the amount advanced less the present value of the loan's repayment stream, which can only be determined by actually selling the loan in private capital markets, a common practice within the private financial sector.

In the case of loan guarantees—and there are 116 active loan-guarantee programs—no entry is made in the budget accounts at the time a guarantee is issued. Only in the event of a loan default—not an unusual occurrence—does the Government pay—to cover the guarantee—and only then is cost of the default recorded. This practice has the undesirable effect of making loan guarantees appear costless to lawmakers, especially at the time they are issued.

We all know that when something is subsidized or free, more is demanded. Federal loan guarantees are no exception.

Good budgeting requires the true cost of the risk of default to be recorded in the budget at the time a guarantee is issued. This spending equivalent could be determined by the purchase of private insurance to replace the Government guarantee. This would result in the transfer of the risk of default from taxpayers generally to private investors. Importantly, the real spending equivalent of loan-guarantee programs would be made explicit, placing loan-guarantee programs on a level field of competition with other demands on the taxpayers' money.

Full enactment of the market plan would require that the true costs of Federal credit programs be recorded in the unified budget.

In the case of Government direct loans, the subsidy value of the loan would substitute for net lending in the budget. In the case of loan guarantees, the cost equivalent—the cost of purchasing private insurance to cover the risk of default—would substitute for the current practice of recording only actual default costs.

Under the market plan, the Federal Financing Bank would function as the Government's marketer of loans and purchaser of insurance for loan guarantees. The market plan subsumes the FFB Plan embodied in H.R. 4629 and endorsed by last year's budget resolution, which would require all agency transactions with the FFB to be recorded in the accounts of the agency rather than in the accounts of the FFB, as is the present abuse.

Implementation of the market plan would carry an important bonus. Not only would the market plan achieve honest budgeting, with respect to Government credit programs, it would, using conservative CBO assumptions, result in a permanent reduction in the public debt, and a one-time reduction in the deficit of $67 billion, if implemented fully over a 3-year period. Using OMB assumptions, the debt reduction would be $166 billion.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to point out that although these debt and deficit reductions are real, one should not assume significant macroeconomic benefits. This is because the impact on capital markets is basically a wash—debt held by the public is merely substituted for debt held by the Government. The lower deficit does indeed reduce Government borrowing requirements, but the sale of Government-held loans absorbs credit, thereby offsetting the impacts from reduced borrowing.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I would note that the Latta substitute does not assume immediate implementation of the market plan. The Latta substitute only assumes a 3-year savings of $10 billion from the market plan but lays the basis for much larger savings in the future years. I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting the Latta substitute.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. LOEFFLER).

Mr. LOEFFLER. I thank my distinguished ranking Member for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, the new rhetorical twist for the fiscal year 1985 budget resolution has been the phrase, "pay as you go." Apparently, the Rules Committee takes a dim view of the Jones budget pay-as-you-go concept, just as I do. For in their report from the committee which accompanied the rule that provided for the consideration of this budget resolution, the Rules Committee takes serious exception to several of the procedures set forth in the Jones package.

With regard to the pay-as-you-go concept, under the section entitled "Tensions Between a New Procedure and an Existing Rule:" the Rules Committee, controlled by the majority party, states, and I quote:

> In adopting this provision the Committee on the Budget appears to be announcing a new policy that it will support waivers of section 311 points of order on spending in cases where Congress will take corresponding action on revenues. The Committee on Rules adopts no such policy.

Evidently, the budget is not as enforceable as the chairman of the Budget Committee would have us believe. So, Members of this body should not gloss over the fact that the purported pay-as-you-go concept ignores the principle of reducing the budget as you go, and will, quite frankly, force us to pay through the nose.

Again, I urge my colleagues to keep this in mind as we enter into the final votes on the budget process in the next few hours.

Mr. Chairman, during the course of this 2-day budget debate we have heard a number of times the statement that we should focus on what is doable, what savings reductions can actually be accomplished. I agree with that premise and that is why I strongly support the budget proposed by Mr. LATTA which is based in large part on the agreement between the President and the Senate majority leadership along with the House minority leadership.

In contrast to the Jones resolution the Latta budget proposal makes a serious and credible effort at setting out a balanced approach at deficit reductions, which recognizes a variety of national needs and priorities and which recognizes the fact that this is only a downpayment—that we will have to come back and revisit these issues if we are to resolve the deficit problem completely.

The principle theme of the Latta budget is that we must recognize that this is a downpayment which will foreshadow, and hopefully make slightly less painful, future action by the Congress to deal with deficits. It also makes a realistic assessment of a balanced approach to this process, based on national priorities and needs, and based on a recognition of what elements have driven the growth of Federal spending in the past, and what will be the sources of growth in the future. We must focus on the spending side of this deficit equation—it would be absolutely futile to attempt to tax enough to eliminate the deficit. If taxes were to be the answer, we would be insuring that the future holds nothing for America but economic stagnation.

Baseline Federal Government outlays in the 1984–89 period, according to the CBO, will average 24.2 percent of GNP—1.3 percentage points higher than in 1981 and 3.5 percentage points above the 1965–81 average. But tax revenues will average about the same share of GNP during the 1984–89 period as they did from 1965 to 1981—approximately 19 percent.

Over the period of 1965 to 1984, Federal spending increased as a percentage of GNP from 18 to 23.9 percent, an increase of almost 6 percentage points, which, CBO points out, is virtually identical to the growth in entitlements over those years.

In the years since 1965 defense spending fluctuated, and under baseline assumptions only by 1989 would it reach the same level of spending as a percent of GNP that it held in 1965. Nondefense discretionary spending contributed to the growth in spending prior to 1981, although growth in that category has declined since then. However, most of the growth in spending over the 1965–84 period took place before 1981. From 1981 to 1984, the ratio of spending to GNP has grown by approximately 1 percentage point—from 22.8 percent to 23.9 percent. During this latter period, defense and net interest have both increased as a share of GNP, nondefense discretionary spending has declined, and entitlement spending holds the same share of GNP in 1984 as in 1981. However, I wish to reemphasize most of the growth in Federal spending now built into the baseline took place prior to 1981 and is due in major part to domestic spending increases.

Furthermore, let us look at what will contribute to growth in Federal spending during the next 5 years, according to CBO: Defense and entitlements will each contribute more than one-third of the total growth in baseline spending. Nondefense discretionary spending will contribute less than 10 percent of the overall increase in outlays.

The Latta budget recognizes both the past sources of growth in Federal spending and the future sources. The Jones budget, on the other hand, virtually ignores domestic spending increases which would account for approximately 40 percent of the increase in baseline outlays over the next 5 years. It proposes to cut entitlement spending by $12.3 billion and nondefense discretionary by $4 billion over 3 years. This compares to a cut in defense spending of $96 billion over 3 years—in spite of the fact that CBO states that entitlements and defense each account for more than one-third of the growth in outlays in the next 5 years.

I do not think this is realistic, nor do I think that the $95 billion outlay cut in defense is doable. The criteria we have been repeatedly admonished to adhere to during this debate. The Jones budget calls for a $16 billion defense outlay cut in fiscal year 1985 compared to a $6 billion reduction in the Latta budget, which is also supported by the Senate majority. The likely outcome is somewhere in between for defense spending, which would only be binding for fiscal year 1985. So, we can anticipate an increase in the deficits projected in the Jones budget, which are already larger in every year than the Latta budget.

Regardless of what compromises are made in conference with the Senate in any area.

A major fallacy of the Jones budget to which we cannot all prey is the assumption that we can safely return to the days when defense spending and the Nation's defenses and security were dangerously neglected. The legitimacy of the President's efforts to restore national defense capabilities have been reaffirmed by the Congress time and time again over the past 3 years—both by Democrats and Republicans.

The issue then, that must be addressed is overall spending by the Federal Government. Domestic spending in all categories—entitlement and discretionary—have contributed a major share in the historical increase in Federal spending relative to GNP. We cannot exclude or make token efforts in these programs from anything but token efforts in our attempts to reduce deficits. We must focus on specific needs and priorities in all areas and not just grandfather all existing domestic spending. And, finally, viewing the source of the deficit problem as stemming from changes in national priorities initiated in 1981 is like the ostrich with its head in the sand—it only proves the absurdity of that position.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. DAUB).

Mr. DAUB. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, in the last 2 days, we have heard an excess of facts and figures tossed around in order to make a variety of points. I feel constrained—particularly in light of comments made yesterday afternoon about the deficit's causes being traceable to 1981 tax reductions—to shed just a bit of light on this matter.

First of all, one just cannot argue with the fact that taxes today are historically high. A family who, in 1950, was earning $14,289 would have needed $45,000 in 1980 to have the same purchasing power. But, the 1950 family would have paid and average Federal income tax of 18 percent while the 1980 family would have faced a 23-percent level. That is an increase of almost a third. Moreover, each additional dollar earned by the family in 1950 would have been taxed at 26 percent whereas in 1980, each one of those dollars would have been taxed at 43 percent.

Second, the 1981 Tax Act, which has been reviled by the majority in the last 24 hours would have reduced taxes by $1,138 trillion over 8 years. I emphasize would have. Because since that time we have increased social security taxes by $270 billion, bracket creep has brought in another $439 billion, the 1982 TEFRA Act took back $281 billion of that tax cut. And finally, the gas tax took in $21 billion. That means that the net tax cut from that 1981 act is about $77 billion over that 8-year period, or about $10 billion a year. Compare that with deficits in the area of $200 billion and the accusation that Americans are getting away with something—falls a little flat. I might add that it seems inevitable that another $50 billion of that remaining 77 is certain to fall within the next few weeks.

The fact is that you cannot blame it on the taxpayer. It is this Congress that created the deficit and it is this Congress whose responsibility it is to reduce it.

I urge the Congress to support the Latta substitute.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. CONABLE).

□ 1620

Mr. CONABLE. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I want to urge the very earnest consideration by all my colleagues of the Latta substitute.

I regret that we have got into such a numbers game here. The President had a realistic proposal when he came before us for the state of the Union address and suggested that we have a Deficit Reduction Commission that would get together all the actors from both Houses who were going to have to preside over the responsible committees in the fiscal area and try to work something out.

We had a very difficult time with that. In fact, Chairman JONES and Chairman ROSTENKOWSKI and others were not appointed to that Commission and, instead, the majority leader came down to the Executive Office Building and we got into what amounted to some rather light footwork avoiding any possibility of serious negotiations. Unfortunately, the same thing happened with respect to the minority over in the other body, with the result that after a couple of weeks we all threw our hands up, came back here, and have tried to do the best we can with the existing process.

The best we can involves a whole lot of competitive plans that have obviously caused confusion among the Members, and it is regrettable that such a basic issue as the budget should be at this point a matter of such confusion.

I am for the Latta substitute. I think Republicans in particular in proposing this have been responsible. It involves taxes, which was difficult for us to swallow. The tax package has been one of the constants through many of these budget proposals, but obviously the Republicans, staking as much political credit as they do on tax reductions, have found it difficult to come up with a tax increase of this dimension, and yet we did it.

We have provided not only for a significant revenue increase that has been difficult for a number of us to swallow, but we have also provided a balanced package. The Latta package that will result is declining deficits over a 3-year period. Most of the other plans do not do that. Chairman JONES' does not. The Latta substitute results in a deficit of $174.6 billion in 1985, $169.2 billion in 1986, and $163.4 billion in 1987. That decline is clearly desirable.

When we were meeting in the Deficit Reduction Commission, the majority leader suggested that $150 billion over 3 years was not enough; that we needed $200 billion. Ironically, this plan, the plan that is before us now, is the only leadership deficit reduction proposal that meets the majority leader's standards. The proposal that he apparently is supporting falls short of the mark by $19 billion, while ours, in effect, reduces the deficit by $205 billion, approximately. So we have met his goals, which he did not.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore (Mr. BROWN of California). The time of the gentleman from New York (Mr. CONABLE) has expired.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CONABLE. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this additional time.

Mr. Chairman, the one important element that I would like to stress is that the Latta package has $72.4 billion in reconciled deficit reductions, and the House Democrat plan has only $59.6 billion.

It seems to me the financial markets will be concerned about reconciled deficit reductions and not those pious, hoped for and improbable deficit reductions that are not part of the reconciliation package. I believe, then, since this is a psychological effort we are making to try to encourage people to believe that we are serious about deficit reduction, the size of the reconciled deficit reduction is the important element for the markets, which now are expressing great concern about our ability to face up to the final issue.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. WEAVER).

Mr. WEAVER. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, because of the deficits and high interest rates, we in Oregon are still in the recession. A mill in Drain, Oreg., is closing this week, laying off 235 workers after only 6 weeks of work. If the deficits continue, the situation will lay waste to the economy of our whole country.

The Latta amendment does nothing to actually get to the cause of the budget deficits because it does not touch the runaway military spending. Military and interest on the debt constitutes 65 percent of a budget that is out of control. I do not believe that Members realize the extreme danger we face with this deficit.

We are not going to have $200 billion deficits. They will be much larger. They are going to begin increasing exponentially. We will not have to wait for our grandchildren to pay for them. We will, soon. The deficits feed on themselves, and we are now entering, on interest on the national debt and the debt itself and deficits, the exponential curve. There is the exponential curve. Here is where we are on it, about to take off on a straight up curve, on a curve Y equals E to the X power.

As deficits increase, debt increases. We will face a $1.8 trillion debt after fiscal year 1985. Interest on that debt begins doubling. It already has come close to that now. Interest rates go up on the larger debt, interest on debt goes up that much faster, increasing deficits, increasing the debt, and further increasing interest, all compounding in a faster exponential curve. Interest, now the second largest item of the national budget, will soon be the largest, exceeding even that of the military, until we go the way of Argentina and Brazil, and nothing—nothing—can stop this exponential curve. We are in it now. Unless we act today to cut the deficits far more sharply, frankly, than any budget resolution that we have before us.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. MINETA).

Mr. MINETA. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, the votes we are about to take are more important than many may now imagine, for these votes will help show whether this body can translate concern into action.

Most of us recognize that the dangers posed by the deficits are truly immense. Current policies would lead to deficits which would absorb three-quarters of our Nation's savings between 1984 and 1989, leaving very little for productive investment and driving up interest rates—the price of the money—for the investment capital which remains.

Today we have an opportunity to address these threats. We have an opportunity to demonstrate our convictions not just with our words but with our votes.

As we vote, let us build upon the sturdy cornerstones of consensus. For example, let us recognize that more Americans want a strong defense but do not want a budget which provides lavish funding for every item on the Pentagon's wish list. And let us recognize that most Americans want to insure the safety and health of the elderly and the disadvantaged, but do not want to face upward surging costs.

The substitute resolution before us now fails to build upon this foundation of consensus, and because of that, we should vote against it. But within the next few hours, we will have the chance to vote for a resolution which is reasonable and balanced, fair and realistic.

We have heard the questions about our Federal deficit. Now we face the most contentious question: What are we going to do about those deficits? Today, we have an opportunity to enact legislation which will lower the deficit by $182 billion over the next 3 years.

Can we afford to neglect that opportunity? No, we cannot. Let us choose the course of constructive action and support the Budget Committee resolution.

□ 1630

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentlewoman from New York (Ms. FERRARO), who is also a distinguished member of the Budget Committee.

Ms. FERRARO. Mr. Chairman, I thank my chairman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the Latta substitute. This substitute tracks the Reagan Rose Garden budget in its approach to deficit reduction. According to its supporters, the virtue of this proposal is that it strikes a balance in putting spending and revenues more in balance. What they mean is that domestic spending, including entitlements, is reduced, military spending is reduced, and revenues are raised.

What the budget actually does is present a cruel and twisted notion of fairness. To suggest that the deficit problem requires reductions in all categories of Federal spending is to imply that all types of Federal spending are equally responsible for the record deficits. You can only do that if you pretend the last 3 years never happened.

The last year before this President took office, the Federal deficit was under $60 billion. Since then, we have not had a deficit of less than $110 billion. In fact, nobody thinks we can get the deficit back down to $110 billion anytime soon.

Where did the rising tide of red ink come from? There are three choices, domestic spending, military spending, and reduced revenues.

It is not domestic spending. To quote from the President's budget message, "Domestic spending * * * will actually be lower this year than it was in 1981." It is also not means-tested entitlements. Again, from the President's budget message. "The rapid growth of means-tested entitlements has been curbed."

That leaves military spending and revenue reductions, and those are the problems. Pentagon outlays in this fiscal year were more than $100 billion more than they had been in 1980. Here is where the increase in spending took place. The Latta package, in its fair approach to deficit reduction, will increase military spending by about 12 percent, more than 7 percent after inflation.

The second problem is revenues. There is a very important point that must be made regarding whether the source of the deficit, going back over the past quarter century, has been increased Federal spending or reduced Federal revenues.

Yesterday, the gentleman from New York (Mr. KEMP) made the point that Federal revenues are now around 19 percent of GNP, or about the same as they have been since 1960.

That is exactly right. But it ignores the fact that in that time there has been a drastic change in the composition of Federal revenues. It ignores the fact that while total Federal revenues are still around 19 percent of GNP, there has been a sharp increase in social security and medicare tax receipts, and a sharp reduction in general revenues.

In 1960, payroll taxes for Social Security made up only 2.1 percent of GNP. Today they take up three times that much, or 6.1 percent.

In 1960, general revenues were 16.4 percent of GNP. Under current policy, in 1985 they will be 12.9 percent. That shortfall in revenues accounts for about two-thirds of this year's deficit.

Looking at the decline in general revenues in greater detail, we see that since 1960, corporate income taxes have dropped, again as a percent of GNP, from 4.3 percent to less than 2 percent.

That is where the deficit has come from. Not from increased spending, but from lessened taxes, and especially lessened taxes on corporations.

To deal with the deficit fairly, we have to deal with the sources of the deficit. The 1981 Reagan budget did enormous damage to millions of Americans. The greatest damage was done to the poor, women, and children especially. Deep cuts were made in education, nutrition, health, and other programs that gave these people hope for improving their own lives and the lives of their children.

The Latta budget, with its cynical appeal to fairness, really locks in and aggravates the unfairness that has been the hallmark of this President and his party for the last 3 years.

The committee budget resolution is a much sounder, much more fair, much more realistic approach. It does not claim, as the Latta package does, $28 billion in phantom savings from the Grace Commission. It does not take more from those who have given up the most in the Reagan budget cuts.

The committee package proposes a modified freeze on most domestic spending. These programs will be allowed small increases, though not enough to keep pace with inflation. It increases a variety of programs that assist low-income Americans by 3.5 percent in real terms, which is the same treatment accorded the military budget. Not a cut in defense, as has been charged, but a responsible increase. And it proposes increased revenues to pay for the real increases in spending, as it adopts the pay-as-you-go approach. If we spend more now, we should raise more now to pay for it.

The committee resolution is a responsible approach, it is doable, it does not lock in place the unfair budget cuts of the past 3 years. I urge its adoption.

Ms. FIEDLER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL).

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, we have had 2 good days of discussion on budget matters. We have had proposals for huge new taxes, we have had proposals for huge defense cuts, and we have had 2-percent solutions and freezes and almost ever other conceivable alternative that the Budget Committee could serve up to us in what most of us believe was a convoluted and senseless rule.

It has been confusing for those who have not followed the proceedings closely; for others it has probably been illuminating. What comes through mostly to me is that this is a wonderful year because the bidding match this year concentrates on budget reductions for the first time since I have been in Congress. Prior to now it has been who is going to spend the most. This year it has been on who can reduce deficits the most; even though some of those suggestions may not hold all the water we would like them to, at least they derive from proper motivation.

We now have before us the Latta budget. It is the Republican alternative. It is administration-endorsed, and it is a reasonable plan. It is not the lowest deficit proposal we have seen, but it is the lowest deficit proposal still pending before this House. It offers a chance of real achievable spending reductions, and I think that is what the people of the United States want from us.

It is not perfect. Many of us would change it. For me, the defense numbers are still too high. Nevertheless, we have followed the President's leadership. His downpayment proposal started us down the path toward reductions. His $150 billion definition helped to focus our efforts, and today we are in that ballpark with the two remaining deficit reduction proposals at $180 billion and $200 billion.

We can do ourselves some good. We can focus particularly on the critical area of discretionary spending where the real battle is going to be fought. Each of us knows that taxes, entitlements, and defense spending are going to be within a narrow area.

Mr. Chairman, this budget helps cut discretionaries. I intend to support it, and I hope the Members will join me in doing so.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Montana (Mr. WILLIAMS).

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. Mr. Chairman, I thank the chairman of the Budget Committee for yielding time to me, and I want to take a moment to commend the committee chairman, the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. JONES), for his diligent and continuous work in hammering out a House committee budget for which I rise in support.

Our Budget Committee, under the leadership of the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. JONES), had a difficult task this year. We spent many hours trying to reflect the various needs of the country, taking into account the various revenue considerations, and seeking to end this terrible deficit.

The committee package provides a 3.5-percent real growth increase to a selected number of nondefense discretionary programs. This category of the budget provides a total of $2.85 billion in outlays over the next 3 years. I appreciated the committee accepting my amendment, which added $678 million in budget authority and $411 million in outlays for education programs specifically targeted to low-income people.

Such programs would include higher education for needy students, elementary and secondary education programs for handicapped and disadvantaged students, and that portion of vocational education which is targeted at the disadvantaged. The overall $2.85 billion package of nondefense discretionary programs assumes funds for these programs, as well as for nutrition, food stamps, health, and training.

Mr. Chairman, again I want to commend the committee chairman, the members of the minority, and also the Budget Committee staff for their long hours and diligent work.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. FORD).

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, many of the resolutions we are considering contain some troubling language regarding the so-called Grace Commission. Many months ago, after reviewing the Grace Commission's personnel management report, I called it a piece of "statistical chicanery." One month ago, CBO and GAO completed a review of the major Grace recommendations and reached essentially the same conclusion I did: The savings are vastly overstated.

For example, $298 billion in 3-year savings claimed by Grace was found to amount to only $98 billion, the bulk of which could be achieved only through controversial policy and program changes requiring congressional approval.

Thus, I am concerned that the Budget Committee's resolution and several of the substitutes assume $2 billion could be saved over 3 years by implementing some administrative actions recommended by the Grace Commission. And I am appalled that the so-called Republican substitute sponsored by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATTA) assumes $28 billion in savings from Grace Commission administrative recommendations.

The Republican's budget resolution is reminiscent of their wishful thinking back in 1981 when they assured us that supply side economics would balance the budget. We know where that got us. Twenty-eight billion dollars in administrative savings? Who are we kidding? Only ourselves.

Our committee has analyzed the Grace Commission recommendations probably as carefully as anyone. In the area of our jurisdiction—personnel management—knowledgeable people now recognize the Commission's recommendations generally contain cooked-up numbers and half-baked policies. It appears even the gentleman from California (Mr. DANNEMEYER) has seen the light. He offered several of the Grace recommendations in committee only to have them voted down 3 to 22.

But I am pleased to note his budget resolution substitute apparently did not assume enactment of any of the major Grace personnel proposals. In fact, if his substitute were not so bad in other areas, I would have been tempted to vote for it, as it proposed to reduce Federal employee pay and benefits by only $103 million over the next 3 years as opposed to the $3.65 billion in reductions contained in the Budget Committee resolution.

I think we are making a mistake, indeed perhaps even acting irresponsibly, if we base any action here today on Grace Commission recommendations which, at least in the area of our committee's jurisdiction, clearly have no credibility. Perhaps $2 billion in administrative savings could be achieved. Clearly $28 billion could not.

Mr. LOEFFLER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. WYLIE).

Mr. WYLIE. I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Latta substitute.

I want to compliment my friend the gentleman from Ohio. He is my next door neighbor and I know of the hard work, care, persistence, and understanding that he has put into his substitute proposal.

On Monday I spoke to the U.S. League of Savings Associations. On Tuesday I spoke to the Ohio Bankers Association and 2 weeks ago I spoke to the American Council of Life Insurance Agents.

These groups are made up of people who make a living adjusting to changes in interest rates in the months and years ahead. They are the market place. Each group told me the single most serious problem facing our Nation is the size of the budget deficit. I happen to believe they are right and said so.

On a recent questionnaire, I sent out, most of those responding said the budget deficit is our most serious national problem. So to represent my district, I must try to do something about it.

The savings and loan industry is particularly sensitive to interest rate changes. I was told in no uncertain terms that if Congress does not do something about the deficit, interest rates will surely rise, maybe not this year, but certainly early next year, and a lot of savings and loans will go out of business.

In each group the first question asked was: Did I think Congress would pass a budget which would substantially reduce the deficit?

In answer to the question, I said I was very apprehensive that we would not, and that is why I have introduced House Joint Resolution 382 as a backup to provide for a Bipartisan Budget Reduction Commission to come up with a package we can vote on—up or down—like the Commission which came up with a package to solve the social security funding problem: A plan to take the problem out of the partisan political arena.

The reason I am doubtful that we can pass a budget, and I hope I am wrong, is because budgets are blooming like flowers in spring. I said there is much partisan bickering about just who is to blame.

The President is being blamed by some. But the fact is that Congress has simply never had the courage to cut spending, even though it became a full partner in the budget process in 1974.

In this substitute which Congressman LATTA offers, President Reagan has made some large concessions and agreed to hold down defense spending by a considerable amount. The President first thought the increase in defense should be about 13 percent. I thought that was too much and said so. The Latta substitute represents a 7.1 percent increase over 3 years; 7.1 percent may be too much. I would have preferred 5 percent. But it is a fact that in the wake of Vietnam, Congress reduced defense spending drastically so that many of our major weapons were becoming seriously outdated. The B-52, our major long-range bomber, was older than many of the pilots who were flying it. Our Navy was allowed to dwindle to 400 ships, down from over 900 previously, and many of our aircraft were out of service due to the lack of spare parts and trained personnel to maintain them.

Unlike the 1950's when nearly 40 percent of our national budget was devoted to defense, we are now spending far more on domestic health, welfare, and social programs than is allocated to defense.

So-called entitlements make up 48 percent of this budget. Defense 27 percent. So controllables only represent 25 percent of the budget.

The significant thing here is the President has agreed to support a reduction of $40 billion in defense from his first budget to get a compromise.

The President's plan would cut $49 billion from domestic spending this year, and tax revenues would raise $47.2 billion over 3 years including interest savings that adds up to $204.5 billion in total deficit reduction over 3 years. The President has made another concession on agreeing to increase tax revenues.

The deficit will not be reduced unless something is done to slow the growth of Federal spending or increase revenues or both.

My constituents feel we can close a few loopholes and increase the tax on alcohol and tobacco, to help keep interest rates down, and that is what this package would do.

The President has been willing to compromise on this important issue and I hope we will see some compromise on the other side. If Congress does not meet the President halfway on reducing deficits, we could see runaway interest rates and growing unemployment again.

We cannot let that happen.

Congress must act responsibly and lend its hand to reduce the deficit. This is a good compromise. I urge its adoption.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. PANETTA).

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, I thank the chairman of the committee for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, some comments were made with regard to enforcement provisions. I want to make clear to the Members that the enforcement procedures, whether you are looking at the Latta substitute or the committee bill, roughly correspond to each other. There are really two enforcement provisions that we have in terms of enforcing the provisions of any budget resolution that is adopted. One is reconciliation and the second deals with the 302 allocations that flow to the Appropriations Committee. Those are really the two key tools that are used by the Budget Committee in the budget process and, indeed, by the House in terms of enforcing the targets that are contained in the budget resolution.

Now, with regard to the Budget Committee proposal, we feel confident that both of those tools can be used and used effectively. As a matter of fact, with regard to reconciliation, it is our full intention next week to take up a reconciliation bill that has $12.3 billion in savings. That is not all from last year. About $9 to $10 billion of that will be new savings recommended by the eight committees that are under instructions with regard to reconciliation; so next week there will be a spending savings bill of approximately $12.3 billion that will be before the House.

In addition to that, we have a revenue bill that will raise approximately $49 billion. Those two together will produce deficit reductions of almost $61 billion within a very few days of the House hopefully adopting a budget resolution.

I think that is enforcement and that is strong enforcement of the resolution and the budget process.

Actually, on appropriations, there is no question we are going to face a tough battle in keeping the appropriations down to the targets if, in fact, the ultimate conference on the budget resolution adopts what the House has proposed. It is going to be tough, but the reality is that we feel it is doable.

If you look at the provisions contained in the Latta proposal with regard to both reconciliation and appropriations, the question you have to ask again and the test that has to be applied to all of the various alternatives is, is it enforceable?

The reality is on reconciliation under Latta it is some $23 billion. Look at the Grace Commission savings, something like $28 billion recommended in terms of Grace Commission savings. There are no specifics that are then tied to reconciliation, so the question has to be asked, where are they going to come from? Is it administrative? Is it legislative? What particular conclusion, in fact, will be implemented by the House?

When you stick the figure in there being recommended, if you do not put that into reconciliation in terms of specific instructions, you do not have enforcement.

On appropriations, if you add up the reductions that are made with regard to the Latta proposal, it is almost an additional $30 to $35 billion. The reality is that if you cannot stick to appropriation targets, you cannot enforce the committee proposal.

For that reason, I recommend voting against the Latta alternative. It is not fair. It is not enforceable.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, the other speakers who have asked for time on our side are not here at this time.

Ms. FIEDLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. I yield to the gentlewoman.

Ms. FIEDLER. Mr. Chairman, I just wanted to make the point that on our side we have the same problem. They are on the way to the floor.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I might ask the gentlewoman from California some questions that have been asked on our side, if the gentlewoman will respond.

On the Grace Commission savings of $28 billion, on the Grace Commission savings, how many of those are legislative and how many are to be carried out by the administration?

□ 1650

Mr. LOEFFLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. LOEFFLER. The $28 billion in Grace Commission savings that we have in our budget resolution is well within range of potential savings for the proposals that have been reviewed by the Congressional Budget Office and the General Accounting Office. They have identified $98 billion in savings over 3 years for a portion of the Grace Commission proposals and have indicated that other proposals involving management initiatives which could not be fully evaluated do, never the less merit further examination. In addition, there might well be some legislative activities that could take place. It could be later this year; it could be part of the reconciliation process.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. The short answer is you do not have those specified; is that correct?

Ms. FIEDLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. I yield to the gentlewoman from California.

Ms. FIEDLER. Actually in the same way that in the Democratic alternative during the course of the Budget Committee there were not specifics. So, too, this will be a matter of the Appropriations Committee making specific decisions.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. How much did you ask the Appropriations Committee to do?

Ms. FIEDLER. Exactly the same as you did.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. We did not ask them anything specifically.

Ms. FIEDLER. You are saying then that they did not have any responsibility.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. No, we did not.

Ms. FIEDLER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to my colleague, the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. EDWARDS).

Mr. EDWARDS of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, the debate has been long and difficult and we are coming to the close now. By and large we are down to the question, in fact we are down to the question of whether we will take what I guess is fair to call the Democrat approach or the Republican approach to the budget.

I am not going to try to get too involved in all of the aspects of this.

I would like to talk primarily about defense. Let me say first of all that whatever is finally the level of budget, somehow we are going to make it work simply because we have got to. But the problem we have got is in trying to deal with the numbers that the committee bill calls for, and that is a $16 billion cut in outlays for fiscal year 1985, we simply cannot do that and still stay at the level of $27.8 billion in budget authority cuts. It simply will not work.

We have seen this happen year after year as we get so-called low outlay cuts, and we try to match those with budget authority cuts, and we find that there is no way that at the bottom line they will come out to meet. So when we are talking about a $16 billion outlay cut in the committee bill, the truth is that we are not talking about a corresponding number of some $27 billion in budget authority cuts. Rather, we are talking about closer to $35 to $40 billion, and some have even said $42 billion in budget authority cuts under the committee bill.

Again, this is something that has happened from time to time. I think the Members should understand exactly what it is the committee is asking us to do.

We are talking about comparisons in the Republican substitute, the Latta substitute of about $40 billion in cuts in outlays over 3 years or $57 billion in cuts in budget authority over 3 years compared with a $95 billion cut in outlays in the committee bill and a $129 or $130 billion in budget authority cuts.

There is no way, there is no way that we can live with a $96 billion outlay cut and at the same time come under that level of $130 billion in budget authority cuts. It simply will not work.

The only way you can do it, literally the only way you can do it is cut into readiness and I mean deeply into readiness. If you go with the numbers of $16 billion in outlay cuts and $27 billion in budget authority cuts you are dealing with a first year spend-out rate of 58 percent.

The truth is that that just is too high.

If we took every outlay dollar in the President's budget, every outlay dollar in the President's budget in fiscal year 1985 and applied it to that $16 billion outlay cut in the committee bill, we would be zero in procurement still and still have a couple of billion dollars to deal with somewhere else to meet the committee numbers, because procurement only spends out at about 14 percent the first year and R&D only spends out at about 56 percent the first year, and O&M spends out at about 80 percent the first year. So we find ourselves having to go to personnel, having to go to the readiness areas in order to get the kinds of cuts that the committee bill has called for.

Let me approach it from another way. I hope you will listen to this because this is extremely important. We have to look at where the outlay dollars are going to be spent that are in the 1985 President's budget.

First off, you see that $96 billion in the outlay budget comes from prior year appropriations. Perhaps you want to make some major cuts in what we have already funded from prior years. Perhaps you want to go back and cut out weapons systems, and they have given me a list of horror stories a mile long where I could use each and every one of your districts and talk about the kinds of things that would come out.

I am not going to do that. But the point is that if you are not willing to give up weapons systems all across the board, many of them from your own districts, and many of you are not willing to, then we have to go right back to the question of manpower and readiness and that is the wrong place to have to cut. Pay and allowances, $90 billion in this outlay bill. We are not going to touch pay and allowances. There is nobody in this House that is going to vote to trim the pay of the troops in order to reach this level that the committee has called for.

Operations in this bill is for $46 billion and investment is for $33 billion. Those are really the only two places then that we can legitimately deal for some $97 or $80 billion to find these major cuts. The truth is we cannot do it and so we have got to again come back to the question of readiness. It is the only place we can find to cut, and it is the wrong place to make major cuts.

So I would appeal to you on both sides of the aisle that the taxes being basically the same in the two bills, the defense area is an area that we have simply got to concern ourselves with. The President has agreed to make major cuts in his defense bill and he has had to swallow hard to do it. And I guarantee you on our side we have had to swallow hard.

I urge you to vote for the Republican substitute. It makes great good sense.

Ms. FIEDLER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. LOTT).

Mr. LOTT. My colleagues, the multiple choice test is about over. We are going to have to vote for something now.

We have gone through this for 2 days and we have all made our case. We have been able to mix and match our votes, but nothing has passed.

We need to go ahead and address this budget question. We need to go ahead and address the question of the deficits, and you have two more chances.

I would like to urge my colleagues to vote for the Latta Republican compromise substitute. It is fair. It has four basic component parts, and let me tell you, my colleagues, this is where we are going to finally wind up.

In the end when the smoke clears, after we vote, after the other body votes, after we go to conference, we are going to wind up with about $150 billions in savings. There may be a little shift here and there, but this is basically where we are going to wind up.

This package is realistic. I was a part of the history of this process, fortunately or unfortunately, when the President came and made his budget proposal and he said, "I will work with the Congress." Then we started what was described kind of loosely as bipartisan negotiations. They never really got off the ground.

It is interesting to me to note that they failed when a proposal was made by the majority leader for a large tax increase. We just never could get it going in a bipartisan way after that tax increase proposal by the gentleman from Texas.

□ 1700

And then we worked with the Republican leaders in the House, and the Senate, and the President; we developed this package. It is a good package. It has tax loophole closings in it—it has a tax bill, if you want to call it that—and there are parts of it I do not particularly like.

But in this process you have to make your best effort. Then there comes a point where you have to vote for something.

We cannot just stand around and say, "A pox on everybody's house, I won't vote for anything." This is a good proposal. It does have the Rostenkowski tax proposals which have been crafted very carefully; it does have nondefense discretionary and entitlements savings; not too many, but some. At least we are moving in the right direction. And it does have a reduction in defense spending.

Frankly, I think it goes too far in reducing defense spending. We can argue about that all day. But I am going to go along with it. I want to take this opportunity as we get to the close of this debate to urge my colleagues to vote for this Latta substitute.

It is what we need to do; it is a move in the right direction and it is achievable. When you go into these other areas, when you get down to 3.5 real gowth in defense, that is dangerous; it is not enough in my opinion, we can debate that and we will debate that later in the appropriations process.

We must make this budget process work. I am really afraid this whole process is going to collapse.

I said that yesterday. I really am worried about it. I have worked with the gentleman on the Budget Committee. I know he wants it to work and I do too, but I am getting awfully frustrated. And if the smoke clears today and we have not passed something, if we have not passed this Latta compromise substitute, we are going to be in real difficulty with the whole process.

I urge my colleagues to vote for it.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished chairman of the Agriculture Committee, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. DE LA GARZA).

Mr. DE LA GARZA. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, first let me say I think we should commend everyone who has worked on the budget process; all those who offered the alternative measures, whether they would be adopted or not, including the President, and I think that all should be commended.

I feel confident that the system and the process is working. But what I would like to say briefly, my colleagues, is that in spite of the fact that agriculture is in very difficult circumstances, in spite of the fact that we have very difficult times in agriculture, I would like my colleagues to know that the Committee on Agriculture has fulfilled its responsibility.

The Jones proposal asked us to save $2.5 billion. The Latta proposal asked us for $2.9 billion. And I would like the House to know that your Committee on Agriculture in a responsible manner has fulfilled that requirement.

And the legislation which you so graciously helped us pass a couple of days ago, gives a saving of $2.9 billion from the agriculture sector, I might say, from the farmers and the people in rural America.

We have fulfilled that. We will be able to comply with the reconciliation, as much as I disagree with the process. But again I would tell you that in the process, as I find myself, responsibly speaking for the committee, the Jones proposal allows us a wee bit of leeway in what we had already saved.

Therefore, I would recommend and urge that the Jones proposal be adopted in order that we might have, in the agricultural sector, a little bit of play, inasmuch as we have fulfilled that requirement which was imposed on us.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas (Mr. DE LA GARZA) has expired.

Ms. FIEDLER. Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I could inquire of the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. JONES) if he has any more speakers besides himself?

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. No; I do not, Mr. Chairman.

Ms. FIEDLER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to our distinguished minority leader, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MICHEL).

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHEL. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, the most startling feature of the Democratic budget is the requirement to reduce defense outlays by $95 billion over 3 years.

Outlays mean the actual disbursement of funds in any one fiscal year.

As many Members of the House know, some of the R&D procurement and military construction accounts spend out very slowly.

Consequently, to gain the Democratic budget outlay savings of $16.2 billion in fiscal year 1985, $34.6 billion in 1986, and $44.2 billion in fiscal year 1987, massive cuts would have to be made in the faster spending accounts such as military personnel and readiness which includes operations and maintenance. We would gut our readiness and personnel accounts if we had to take these extremely large outlay cuts.

The Democrates have stated we need a defense "second to none." If we had to take these cuts, we certainly would be moving toward second place. To place this Democratic budget in perspecive, it is instructive to note that this budget provides lower funding levels for fiscal year 1985 and fiscal year 1986 than the last Carter budget which was overwhelmingly rejected by the Congress.

NATIONAL DEFENSE FUNCTION

	Fiscal year—		Total
	1985	1986
Carter:
Budget authority	$289.7	$324.1	$613.8
Outlays	267.8	299.5	567.3
House Democrats:
Budget authority	285.6	310.4	596.0
Outlays	255.8	276.0	531.8
Difference:
Budget authority	−4.1	−13.7	−17.8
Outlays	−12.0	−23.5	−35.5

The House Democrats plan if executed would require the following type of actions:

Hold military pay increase to 3.5 percent for 1985–87; freeze military personnel at 1984 level; freeze some benefits; thus severely impacting military moral and jeopardizing ability to recruit and retain needed personnel.

Retire the remaining B–52G squadrons, reducing our strategic nuclear bomber forces as well as deleting a critical long range conventional air attack capability.

Deactivate all Conus air defense squadrons except for two active F–15 units, thus reducing over 80 percent of our Conus air defense interceptors.

Deactivate at least one Army division, possibly requiring withdrawal of some forward-deployed forces from either Europe or Korea.

Deactivate up to three wings of Air Force tactical fighters, forcing us to withdraw front line fighter units from Europe.

Decommission up to a dozen naval ships, a significant reduction in our surface escorts and amphibious lift capacity.

Reduce fleet-wide steaming hours and flying hours, thus seriously degrading combat readiness.

Reduce several major shipbbuilding programs:

Possibly including SSN–688 (attack sub), delaying the buildup of our critically needed modern nuclear attack submarine fleet;

Terminate the planned reactivation of the last two battleships, thus denying our combat forces a proven, effective shore bombardment capability enhancement;

Probably deferring our goal of attaining 600 deployable combat ships until the mid-1990's.

Consider withdrawal of carrier task forces from both the Indian Ocean and the Mediterranean Sea, causing significant international political problems with our European and Mideast allies and increase national security risk probably resulting in further instability in Mideast and Southwest Asia.

Consider canceling or reducing several Army major weapon systems including Army air defense systems, the M–1 Abrams tank, the M–2 Bradley fighting vehicle, the AH–64 Apache helicopter, and communications and electronics equipment. These actions would exacerbate the serious imbalance between United States and Soviet forces.

Terminate or defer procurement of major combat aircraft including the Navy's A–6E, EA–6B, F–18, and AV–8B and the Air Force's F–15, and F–16.

Reduce ship overhauls and the fleet modernization program reducing the combat readiness of our fleet.

Reduce aircraft modification and improvement program, thereby deferring the installation of equipment designed to enhance the combat capability of our front line aviation.

Make across-the-board reductions in research and development programs, perhaps as high as 5 percent to 10 percent, severely curtailing our technology development and terminating several promising advances.

Cancel or defer planned construction projects both in Conus and overseas, including major reductions in planned and long overdue facilities modernization in Europe, thereby degrading both personnel morale and combat readiness.

THE 3.5 PERCENT REAL GROWTH PROPOSAL

The 3.5 percent real growth in Budget Committee recommendation would mean a reduction of $27.8 billion of budget authority and $16.15 in outlays from the President's Budget in fiscal year 1985.

Armed Services Committees has tentatively agreed to meet a 6 percent real growth level—a cut of $19.5 billion in budget authority.

A cut of $19.5 billion in budget authority will have serious impact on a broad number of important programs that many Members in this House support.

A cut of $27.8 billion in budget authority would be much deeper and involve many more programs.

This cut is being proposed at the same time many Members who support the reductions are approaching the committee privately to ask that their program be protected.

Budget Committee recommendation specifies that of the reduction from the President's Budget in fiscal year 1985, $16.15 billion must be in outlays. For the three-year period, the total reductions would be $95 billion.

This proposed reduction comes at a time when there is unanimous agreement not to make cuts in military readiness programs.

There is no way to make the cuts in outlays proposed without cutting readiness.

The various major defense accounts have first year outlay spendout rates as follows:

Research and development, 57 percent.
Procurement, 13 percent.
Operation and maintenance, 78 percent.
Military personnel, 98 percent.
Retired pay, 100 percent.
Military construction, 15 percent.
Family housing, 54 percent.

Therefore, to meet the outlay levels contained in this recommendation, here are a couple of ways to achieve a reduction of $16.15 in outlays in fiscal year 1985:

Reduce the FY 85 R&D account from $34 billion to $5.6 billion;

Eliminate the entire FY 85 Procurement account of $115 billion and still save only $14.95 in outlays.

Since no one would seriously propose such reductions, that leaves major cuts in readiness (O&M), or major reductions in the current number of military personnel.

The budget resolution as it is currently structured is unrealistic.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, I said yesterday in what was billed as a debate on the original Reagan budget, that I would have felt more comfortable debating legislation to abolish the budget process.

After hearing much of the debate last night and today, I haven't changed my mind.

What I see in all of this budgeteering, which closely resembles something my children used to enjoy on television, called "Mousekateering" is a menagerie of meaningless numbers.

When I see all of these budgets, each more absurd and irrational than the last, I am reminded of the old radio show called "Can You Top This?"

That is the question all of this meaningless data seeks to answer—not the question of the public good but whether one of us can top the other in coming forth with something politically palatable.

This whole exercise began with a simple challenge from the President in his state of the Union message.

It is politically feasible and economically desirable, he said, to make a down-payment on the deficit. He thought we could take a small step, but an important step, toward deficit reduction in an election year.

The Latta substitute is to a great extent the product of the President's call for compromise.

The bi-partisan deficit reduction talks failed. When they did, the President went to work with the Senate majority in consultation with the House majority.

The result was a Republican compromise, which is contained in the Latta substitute. It is not perfect. It is the product of an honest effort.

It can be implemented, maybe not 100 percent, but I will venture to say that more of this compromise package can be achieved than any other on the floor yesterday or today.

This substitute ought to be adopted, but I have no illusions about where the votes are.

What will happen here today will be toward political ends, rather than fiscal or economic ends.

Before I close, I want to address one specific area, that of defense spending.

We have heard the phrase, pay as you go, to describe the way the House Democrats plan to pay for defense.

I think that should be changed to pray as you go because if we ever adopted this budget our only defense would be the power of prayer.

I have been personally inclined toward substantial reductions in the President's defense requests, even to something slightly below the Rose Garden figures.

But I have been careful in my own position to understand what a reduction in defense actually means, in terms of readiness, treaty obligations, world stability, and our worldwide commitments.

President Ronald Reagan did not invent those commitments. He inherited them.

They are American obligations, not conservative, or liberal, or Democrat, or Republican obligations. If you do not like them, let us openly debate which ones we should turn our backs on.

But for the sake of this country and world peace, do not unilaterally weaken the President's ability to meet commitments we have kept for two generations.

If the Democratic leadership defense figure is adopted it will mean holding military pay increases to 3.5 percent for 1985-87 freezing military personnel at 1984 levels and freezing other benefits.

We are going to have to close base installations and release up to 100,000 civilian personnel. How many want to volunteer that their districts be chosen as the ones in which such devastation will take place?

Can we have a show of hands?

We will have to decommission up to a dozen naval ships. Shipbuilding programs will be cut back. Fleetwide steaming time hours and flying hours will be cut back. We may have to withdraw our carrier task forces from both the Indian Ocean and the Mediterranean Sea.

At this moment, a Soviet fleet is brazenly flaunting its strength in the Atlantic. But we are asked by the Democratic leadership to cut our Navy.

What a sense of timing.

I could go on and on. Fewer combat aircraft, canceling for major Army weapons systems.

Is this what we have come to?

Retain some commonsense today. Make your decision out of clear sighted national interest.

I ask you to vote for the Latta substitute, or disapprove it all and let us go back to the drawing board.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to join with many others who are opposing this particular substitute. I think clearly as it has been said, that someone would like for us to go back to the drawing board. I do not think we need to go back to the drawing board because what we see in the substitute is the continuation of the last 3 years.

Particularly upon those programs where the safety net has been ripped to shreds. What we see over the last 3 years is a 39-percent reduction in that safety net. Now this substitute asks for an additional 17-percent reduction in the safety net, while at the same time continuing this awesome defense buildup that is beyond any rational effectiveness in providing for our security.

And I would like to join with those in saying we do not need to go back to the drawing board if going back to the drawing board means essentially following the same plan of the last 3 years, and I certainly would urge my colleagues to defeat this substitute.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, at the outset let me commend the House on both sides of the aisle for the debate the last 2 days that we have had on the 1985 budget resolution. We have approached the budget from different perspectives, some liberal, some conservatives, some in between.

But the one thing that has been the guiding principle among all of the budgets is that deficit reduction has to be the prime goal.

□ 1710

And I think the House is to be commended on that particular thing.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LATTA. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Let me agree with the chairman on that. I think there is a deep feeling in this House that something has to be done with those deficits. It is just a question of how we get there and hopefully we can resolve those deficits and get there, because it is mighty important to the future of this country.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. I thank the gentleman.

As I said in opening the debate yesterday this House should be guided by two standards in choosing which budget we are going to support.

One of those standards is reality. How honest is that budget? How much smoke is filled in that budget? How much is reality?

And the second is enforceability. If we vote for a budget resolution, are we willing to turn around next week and next month and vote for the individual appropriation bills, the reconciliation bills, that will carry out that budget so that we can be honest with the American people.

I think one of the things that we can see in looking at the votes on the different substitutes that have been offered is that there has been an honest approach in the House to look at these budgets and to vote on the budget resolutions as we would vote to implement those budget resolutions.

I think again the House is to be commended.

I would like to close this debate and first of all say what I feel are the main weaknesses in the Latta substitute. Really I see three of them.

The first principal weakness in the Latta substitute is the amount of financing it gives to the military. There is nothing in the Latta substitute that asks the Pentagon to tighten its belt the way we are asking the rest of the American people to tighten their belt. As a matter of fact, in the Latta substitute, there is an increase in Pentagon spending over current policy. Democrats and Republicans alike, in the House and Senate, last year established current policy spending for the defense of a 5-percent real growth.

The Latta substitute calls for about a 7- or 7½-percent real growth in military expenditures.

And the argument has been made if we do less we are cutting into readiness.

My argument is that that is not the case. I have just been, for the last several months, having a series of neighborhood coffees and listening tours in my district in Tulsa and in Oklahoma. At every one of those occasions comes up the question about waste and spending and inevitably it is waste and spending at the Pentagon.

Several of my Oklahoma constituents received a mailing from the NFIB. And that NFIB mailing pointed out that an Allen wrench the Department of Defense paid $9,606 for cost the average consumer in a small business hardware store 13 cents. And that a 1-cent antenna motor pin cost the Pentagon $7,417. And a 1-cent nut cost $2,043 to the Pentagon. And a 14-cent bolt cost $1,075 to the Pentagon.

My Oklahoma constituents say that is waste. That is not readiness, that is a ripoff and you have got to stop that kind of a ripoff.

I think that by giving more than current policy now calls for, for defense, is not responsible public policy and you are not going to get the kind of belt tightening that is needed. That is the first reason why the Latta substitute should be rejected.

Second, applying the test of enforcibility. I think that it is not likely that the user fees, nearly $7 billion of new user fees, are going to be passed by this Congress. We have tried that the last 3 years. It has not happened. So I do not think that is going to be enforceable.

The Latta budget calls for a 50-percent cut in Federal unemployment agencies and unemployment insurance. Well, in Tulsa we are in a recession. Supply side economics is not working in Tulsa right now. People are unemployed. I do not think we can cut back on our unemployment agencies at this point, a 50 percent in unemployment agencies of Federal support. That is what we have from the gentleman's budget.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LATTA. Let me correct the gentleman. I am sure that he wants to be accurate.

It is a shifting to the States who have money running out their ears.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. I appreciate the gentleman's saying that the Federal Government is going to shift this cost to the States, because I can assure the gentleman that in the State of Oklahoma money is not running out of our ears. We are cutting back in education. We are cutting back in personal services. We are cutting back in infrastructure. We do not have that to take care of the unemployed in Oklahoma.

The third major reason why the Latta substitute should not be adopted is it is not real. And again I want to dwell on this $28 billion in Grace Commission savings. That is nine times more cuts from the Grace Commission recommendations that President Reagan's first budget or second budget calls for and the Republican budget in the other body, nine times more.

When we asked them how is this going to be implemented, how much is administrative, how much is legislative, there is no answer.

But I think the true test of the phoniness of it is the fact that they say we are going to cut outlays $28 billion, but they never say how it is going to be done and they do not cut $28 billion from the Appropriations Committee. That is the way cuts are made. It is not done by hope or someone out there, some magic gremlin going around making savings. It is done by us, voting in the House of Representatives and the other body to cut appropriations bills. They do not call for that in their budget.

So I think the Latta substitute should be rejected. It is not enforceable. It is not real. In the one area where the most waste now exists, the military expenditures, they do not cut, they actually increase.

Let me say a few words about the committee bill, because that is the other budget we have ahead of us. The committee bill does have real cuts, it has enforceable cuts, cuts of $182 billion from the projected deficits over the next 3 years.

The committee budget adopts two very important concepts. One, the concept of modified freeze, shared sacrifice, all spending programs are treated alike and frozen at a level below the rate of inflation. The only exceptions to that, which are held to the rate of inflation, are military expenditures, social security, and the programs affecting the truly needy.

The second important concept of the committee budget is a pay-as-you-go concept, something we have got to build into budget process more and more. It says in effect if we have to have more military, we have to have security in our time to protect our generation then we ought to pay for it. We build into this budget a 3½-percent real increase in the military expenditures and a 3½-percent increase in the programs affecting the truly needy, but we pay for it. We do not pay for it with a credit card that our grandchildren will have to pay on top of their own responsibilities.

I think the committee budget is clearly preferable. It is a good budget. It is a sound budget. It will take a huge bite at those projected deficits. And more than that, if we pass that tonight, if we do not delay dealing with these deficits, we can come back next week, and will come back next week and begin the major enforcement tools of this budget with a reconciliation cut in spending of $12.35 billion from the growth and entitlement programs and a tax bill to pay essentially for our military.

That is the kind of message we ought to send to the American people. That is the kind of message that will be received positively in the financial markets and will have a stabilizing effect on interest rates and keeping this economy in a growth path. That is the responsible thing to do.

I urge my colleagues to support the committee budget and let us get on with the job of getting this economy in recovery.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. I will yield briefly to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LATTA. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The gentleman's budget calls for $95.6 billion reduction in defense.

Would the gentleman tell the House how many billion dollars in reduction the Senate Budget Committee Democrats have agreed to?

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. I do not know what the Democrats in the other body have agreed to. I can tell the gentleman what is before the House. I am not going to be debating a Senate resolution because they are in great disarray at the present time.

What I hope we will do here tonight, since the other body is in great disarray and has not passed a budget resolution, has not commenced work on reconciliation or anything else, what I think we can do here tonight by passing what I think is a responsible budget is to send a very strong message to the other body that we need them to act, too. And I think that kind of pressure will get them to get their act together.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. WRIGHT. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I think the gentleman is making a very significant statement. Everything the gentleman says is demonstrably accurate and true. I do not believe he has been unfair in his characterizations.

□ 1720

While endorsing all that he says and associating myself with his remarks, I think I should like to express to our colleagues on the Republican side of the aisle my appreciation and my congratulations to them for the high quality and high level of debate that has characterized their presentations today, as well as those I believe of the people on my side of the aisle, too. I think this has been a debate which possesses the quality of which the Congress should be proud. Members have been given a wide variety of choices. They have asserted their individual preferences. Now we come to the final choice of all: Do we adopt the Republican substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATTA), the ranking minority member of our committee, or do we reject that and then approve the committee budget?

I think the committee budget, of course, is that which we should approve. It is the result of our long deliberations.

What I want to say, mainly, at this time, however, is something in which I think all of us could join—the liberals, the conservatives, the Democrats and the Republicans—in acknowledging the enormous gratitude which all of us feel to the gentleman from Oklahoma, the man in the well at this moment, JIM JONES, for the leadership that he has exhibited over these last 4 years of the House Committee on the Budget. He has been at all times fair, he has been open to suggestion, he has been available, he has been accessible, he has been in every instance eminently dignified in his response, he has been a man of almost inexhaustible patience. Because of these qualities which he has brought to this budget process, I believe the process itself has thrived and has succeeded.

For all of those reasons, I know that all of our colleagues will want to join with me in expressing our enormous appreciation for the quality of leadership that has been exhibited in this budget process and in this committee over the past 4 years by the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. JONES).

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for his remarks.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATTA).

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 107, noes 311, not voting 14, as follows:

□ 1730

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. Hyde for, with Mr. Hawkins against.

Mr. Paul for, with Mr. Boehlert against.

Mr. PERKINS and Mr. MITCHELL changed their votes from "aye" to "no."

So the amendment in the nature of a substitute was rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Chairman, I raise to lend my support to the budget proposal of the committee and its distinguished chairman, Mr. JONES. We have debated a number of different proposals embodying a variety of philosophies some I agreed with, others I did not. However, it is imperative that we enact a budget resolution so we might establish our targets for spending and revenues and begin to tackle our single biggest domestic problem—the deficit.

For the sake of real simplicity, the deficit problem we have is a result of two things. We spend somewhere in the vicinity of $925 billion. We produce revenues to pay for the spending to the amount of $745 billion. The difference is the deficit. Therefore, if we are to, in fact, lower the deficit in a meaningful fashion, our solution must blend a combination of lower spending and higher revenues.

The Jones budget proposal would in fact do just that and in a fair and equitable way, I might add. It would accomplish a deficit-reduction plan amounting to some $182 billion over 3 years. This plan does it honestly—up front with no gimmicks. It would accomplish it by freezing spending for a variety of programs but not the kind of deep freeze that would punish people in need. The Jones freeze means that certain nondefense discretionary programs would receive a 3.5-percent increase—which although less than inflation which is generally calculated at about 5 percent—is at least a basis to insure a largely maintained effort for these programs.

The inherent fairness in the Jones budget approach comes in its treatment of the vitally important means tested programs for the poor. It allows these programs to receive an increase of 3.5 percent above inflation. This represents both fiscal sense and compassion. The increase is not exorbitant—every cent it provides for is needed by those people whose very survival can depend on the benefits from these programs. Consider programs like medicaid and SSI, which provide vital services and income maintenance to the poorest segment of our society. The 3.5-percent increase provided is what these programs need and what we can afford because we are honest enough to say: we must provide offsetting revenues even for these increases.

As far as defense spending, the Jones budget again demonstrates inherent good fiscal sense to me. It allows for an increase of 3.5 percent above inflation for defense—a level which will not leave us vulnerable in terms of our national security—nor vulnerable in terms of our economic security. The original budget of the President called for a 13-percent increase above inflation. As my colleagues know his original budget in large part, because of this defense increase, was rejected. Other proposals have provided increases twice as high. I oppose those levels. So too do I oppose massive reductions in defense spending. I can and did support one proposal that made cuts in defense but did so by reducing and eliminating funds for certain inefficient weapons system programs. I believe as far as defense spending is concerned, that the Jones budget provides us with the proper balance.

Finally with respect to revenues, I support this proposal because it sets realistic revenue levels which in fact are on the threshold of being adopted as they are contained in H.R. 4170, which will be before this House next week. It does not propose to impose massive new tax requirements on the individual. It promotes better tax equity by closing loopholes.

One other thought about medicare and these budgets. The Jones budget presumes genuine savings in medicare of $4 billion over 3 years. However just as important as the bottom line in terms of savings is how they are achieved. The Jones budget subscribes to the theory I have supported that cuts must come from the provider, not the consumer level. Older people in America pay more for medicare and get less. They are paying more in out-of-pocket expenses now than they were before medicare was established. It is wrong and should not be perpetrated. Why should an elderly person on social security who receives a 3.5-percent COLA have to endure increases in medicare costs of some 18 percent. Why should providers reap such enormous profits from medicare. We began last year with the system of prospective reimbursements of DRG's. It was important then to begin the process and we related 25 percent of all of our hospital reimbursements to this new system. It seems to be working and therefore should be expanded to not just hospitals but physician fees and other health care facility costs.

The Jones budget is not perfect as we do not operate with a perfect budget system in Congress. However it is a vast improvement over the President's original budget and the Republican substitute which still adheres to the philosophy that only some must suffer for the good of others—but the some that suffer were suffering before and are suffering more now.

We need to pass this budget and get to the hard decisions about how much each program will get. However the budget resolution is our guiding light—our philosophical direction if it is enlightened—so too will our future budgetary policies. If it is fiscally sensible, so too will be our future actions. The Jones budget meets these tests and deserves our support.●

● Mrs. BURTON of California. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Democratic Budget Committee resolution. This proposal is the most politically viable, economically sound substitute. While I have reservations about some of its provisions, I am pleased that the committee made great efforts to address the needs of the poor, the elderly, children, and the disabled.

We must pass a budget which begins to reduce the massive Reagan deficits—the Democratic budget produces a deficit $33 billion less than the Republicans' plan over the next 3 years.

While I am concerned about the deficit and its effect on the economy, I am determined that we do not once again pass a Reagan-Republican budget which wreaks havoc on the poor, the elderly, and the young of our Nation. The Washington Post reported just this morning that the tax and budget policies of the Reagan administration have had their most negative effect on those people at the low end of the income scale. We must redress these wrong policies.

The Democratic committee substitute will provide $5 billion for domestic spending. The committee recommends increases for valuable programs such as Head Start, women, infants and children—WIC, Legal Services, maternal and child health, and food stamps. A program in which I have special interest, child nutrition, would also receive increased funding.

I also voted for the Black Caucus and Democratic Study Group proposals. The DSG budget, like the committee resolution, preserves and enhances important social programs, while providing for an even greater deficit reduction by recommending major tax reform.

I was especially pleased to vote for the Black Caucus budget, which offered the only defense spending reduction. The Pentagon's wasteful spending habits must be curtailed. Even more importantly, the Black Caucus recommended substantial increases in spending for education, for the elderly and handicapped, and for other vital domestic programs.

I commend the Budget Committee and the Democratic leadership for allowing these alternative proposals to come to the House floor and for developing a budget resolution which presents a serious challenge to the Reagan-Republican economic plan. Democrats must show that we still care about the disadvantaged, that we can solve the Nation's economic problems without placing further financial burdens on those who have borne so much in the past 3 years of Reaganomics.●

● Mr. GRAY. Mr. Chairman, today, the Members of this House will have the opportunity to speak to the people of this Nation with a firm voice about the impact of President Reagan's convoluted fiscal and economic policies which have ravaged the poor and disadvantaged in this Nation since 1981.

Four years ago, when then candidate Ronald Reagan was campaigning for the Presidency, he promised the American people that he would "chart a new course" for America.

Four years ago, little did the American people realize that the new course was the course of most suffering, most division, and most disparate sacrifice, and that this President would use the congressional budget process to enact the most radical economic changes that this Nation had witnessed in decades.

For 4 years, we have suffered under a President whose primary objective, in framing the economic policies of this Nation, has been to redistribute this Nation's wealth—unevenly and unfairly.

By shredding the social safety net and decimating those programs which provide the basic necessities of life, this President has been able to direct the disposition of what limited resources we have toward the massive acquisition of defense gadgetry.

It is this very economic philosophy which has fueled the deficit explosion. Today, in the third year of Ronald Reagan's Presidency, the deficit will reach nearly $200 billion.

By the end of this year, the projected Reagan deficits will total more than half of the $996 billion in deficits amassed by all previous Presidents since World War II.

As a member of the House Budget Committee, I have had the painful responsibility of examining the President's budgets in all too great detail. I was gratified to see this House last night reject the President's budget by an overwhelming margin.

The Democratic members of the House Budget Committee determined early that this was the year to reject the regressive Reagan economic policies of the past 4 years, and to restore this Nation to sound economic policy.

Toward this end, we met continually during the first 3 weeks in March to formulate a consensus on a first concurrent resolution on the budget, which restored some of the cuts in the programs which President Reagan has reduced most severely during his administration, yet effected more than a "downpayment on the deficit."

We reached our objective and reported to you the resolution which is before you now calling for $49.8 billion in new revenues, $49.8 in increased defense and domestic spending, and a deficit impact which is greater than that which the President proposed.

More importantly, the committee package will allow essential programs to increase at a rate equal to inflation.

In the entitlement area, generally, our Democratic budget provides for full inflation adjustments for social security, medicare hospital insurance, and all means-tested entitlement programs.

Real growth in some especially hard hit entitlements, such as social security disability insurance, nutrition, and preventive health care for infants and pregnant women.

While most of my Democratic colleagues on the committee agreed that this was the right approach, I believed that we needed to do more for those low-income discretionary programs which had been especially hard hit under Reagan.

Toward this end, I sought the inclusion of guarantees in the budget resolution that certain high-priority domestic programs will have real increases in spending, after adjusting for inflation.

These targeted programs, which are designed to assist the most economically disadvantaged of our citizens, include: Community health centers; maternal and child health; migrant health; WIC; Head Start; compensatory education and other education programs; children services programs, including child welfare, child abuse, juvenile justice and runaway and homeless youth; low-income energy assistance; low-income housing; legal services; community services block grants; training; education for the handicapped; Pell grants; supplemental education opportunity grants; the trio programs; institutional support for historically black colleges; and Indian education.

I also sought inclusion of language in the resolution which stipulates that the spending targets in the resolution cannot be used by the administration to argue against the enactment of the Humphrey-Hawkins jobs bill or against increasing the funding levels for aid to families with dependent children, AFDC, the State component of SSI, title XX, or an increase in the earned income tax credit.

This committee resolution reflects all of these concerns.

Mr. Chairman, in my view, this resolution formulated by the Budget Committee represents a far more economically viable and humane alternative to either the discredited Reagan proposals or the Senate Republican proposal, which incorporates many of the President's fallacious economic assumptions coupled with his proposed reductions in vital services.

I believe that adoption of this alternative will give us our first real opportunity to begin the process of reversing the regressive Reagan policies which have gutted the programs so vital to the growth and survival of our children, our cities, and our Nation, while establishing this Nation on the firm and straight path of responsible economic and fiscal policy.●

● Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to reaffirm my strong support for a balanced, sensible budget, and likewise express my concern over any budget proposal which would minimize the President's efforts to achieve such budgetary balance. If Congress ever expects to create a balanced budget and eliminate the staggering national debt, we must institute strict guidelines to assure sensible budgeting through reduced spending, without increased taxes.

While I am not opposed to certain tax adjustments, this approach should receive a minimal amount of emphasis. Rather, as my constituents have repeatedly stated to me, tax increases should rarely be initiated, and should never be allowed to foster out-of-control spending. Such spending could never lead to the successful operation of any private sector enterprise, and should never be considered a viable alternative for the operation of government.

For this reason, I urge my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to join me in shouldering the fiscal responsibility mandated by the Constitution. Instead of placing unconstructive blame on the President, we must seriously consider the repercusions of our votes on this measure, and then choose to support a budget package which would: first, reduce escalating domestic spending; second, cut waste and abuse within the Federal Government; third, lead to lower interest rates and higher economic growth; fourth, support an appropriate level of defense spending; fifth, reject major tax increases; and sixth, establish tax increases only if tied to guarantees that spending will not increase.

This approach must be considered the only feasible solution to our Federal deficit crisis. Any thing less would threaten the integrity of this body, and invite the return of the same destructive forces which earmarked the recession.●

● Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Chairman, each year it is the responsibility of Congress and the President to devise a Federal budget for the coming fiscal year. It is never an easy task and, no matter the politics, the final outcome is always a compromise. The budget submitted today, as well as its substitutes, are a result of compromises. No one is likely to be entirely pleased with any of them. But the overriding concern—the final objective of any budget—is which of these proposals is the most fair and equitable, yet at the same time maintains fiscal responsibility.

We have several proposals before us which aim to reduce the deficit and be fiscally responsible. To one degree or another, all of these budgets, including the President's, increases revenues; all, except one, reduces domestic spending; and all, except the President's, modifies the large growth in defense spending. Basically, we have no radically different approaches to our deficit dilemma; we know we must reduce domestic spending, modify defense growth, and make modest revenue increases.

There are several very pragmatic budgets being proposed, but perhaps the most pragmatic has been presented by the House Budget Committee. It incorporates a comprehensive and prudent deficit reduction program, combining domestic spending savings, modest increases in defense and selected domestic programs, and revenue increases. The committee budget freezes all programs at a 3.5 percent increase above fiscal year 1984 levels. Realizing, however, that certain national priorities take precedence, the committee is requesting a real growth above inflation of 3.5 percent for defense and certain low-income programs. The additional cost—$44 billion for defense and $5 billion for domestic programs—will be on a pay-as-you-go basis. That is, revenues will be increased to provide for the new spending—defense or domestic programs.

This realistic plan to control deficit growth is absolutely necessary for this Nation's economic progress. Under current policy, deficits will grow to $270 billion by 1987 and over $300 billion by 1989. According to the Congressional Budget Office (CBO), a nonpartisan organization, the House budget will make modest, yet significant progress to reduce the deficit. Under this plan, deficits will be approximately $175 billion in fiscal year 1985; $172 billion in fiscal year 1986; and $181 billion in fiscal year 1987. In contrast, the President's plan would only reduce the deficit $181 billion, $184 billion, and $198 billion, respectively. And while the President's deficit reduction proposal calls for approximately the same amount of revenue increases, it does not cover the anticipated spending increases nor does it endorse the prudent "pay-as-you-go" approach to Federal spending.

Several years ago, Congressman GEORGE MILLER began submitting his "pay-as-you-go" budget. Aimed at controlling runaway spending and reducing the deficit in a responsible, equitable, and effective manner, the approach, which I have consistently supported, requires revenue increases for spending increases. It does not dictate what should and should not be spent or what taxes to increase, but it does require a new sensibility to the American public. It requires the President and Congress to explain where our money is being spent and how we are going to pay for it.

This President has relied on his charisma, charm, and, yes, individual tax reductions to lure the American public into complacency about his new spending priorities which substantially increase our deficits. The fact remains that this President has tripled our annual deficits. Our Nation's debt will double to almost $2 trillion between 1980 and 1985 and more than triple to over $3 trillion by 1989.

This administration has not reduced deficits or Federal spending as it promised. Instead, it has merely altered priorities—more for defense and less for domestic programs. As anyone can tell you, no matter how you spend your money, if you spend more than you earn, you are still in debt. An August 1983 Congressional Budget Office (CBO) report indicates that spending for human resources programs has been reduced, in total, by about 7 percent relative to what it would have been under the laws existing at the beginning of 1981. These areas include programs in retirement and disability, health care, education, and job training.

The Budget Committee attempts to compensate for some of this decrease by providing a 3.5 percent increase above inflation—for a total of $5 billion—for programs in certain areas: Nutrition, health, job training, and education. These increases would total $2.85 billion, yet despite this, total net savings in nondefense discretionary spending of $4.6 billion over 3 years would result. These programs are aimed directly at those who can least afford it. Women and their children, for example, have taken the brunt of recent domestic spending cuts, yet a recent report predicts that this group, left to its own devices, could comprise nearly 100 percent of the poor by the year 2000. Surely our children deserve better. As President Reagan stated in his state of the Union address in January, "Our children come first."

The House budget recognizes the need for our Nation to maintain certain commitments. Our Nation should have a defense second to none. The Committee Budget would continue our defense buildup of the last several years by providing a 3-year cumulative increase of $139.5 billion. The committee recommendation does not mandate reductions from current defense funding, but rather would slow the rate of proposed funding increases. The defense buildup should occur at a more reasoned and efficient pace, understanding that the expensive weapon commitments we make today must somehow be paid by our children tomorrow.

The funding level of $285.7 billion recommended for fiscal year 1985 would represent the sixth consecutive year of growth to the defense budget. The level of defense funding recommended for fiscal year 1985 is 96 percent greater—45 percent in real terms—than the fiscal year 1980 level. The funding recommended for fiscal year 1987 is 131 percent greater—56 percent in real terms—than fiscal year 1980, and would represent the largest level of defense funding in real terms for any year since the end of World War II, including the Korean and Vietnam war periods. The committee recommendation would more than fulfill the 1979 pledge of the NATO allies to increase defense funding by 3 percent real growth each year.

Even the President's budget projections do not take into full consideration major military initiatives such as the administration's space weapons program. Costing only a couple of billions of dollars now, this "star wars" initiative is expected to grow astronomically, eventually costing us hundreds of billions, if not trillions, of dollars—easily dwarfing the arms race on Earth. Instead of spending our limited resources on systems we pray we will never use, we should abide by existing treaties; for example, the 1972 Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty, and seek ways to reduce our tensions and find alternatives to creating a volatile world for ourselves and others.

Financing even modest increases in our Federal budget is a most disagreeable task. But despite recent good economic news—new business starts and reduced unemployment—we simply will not be able to grow out of our deficit problem. For each 1-percent reduction in employment, we will save approximately $25 billion through increased revenues and reduced benefit costs. To gain control over our deficit, we would need to completely abolish unemployment. I regret to say that this is highly unlikely.

Reluctantly, we will need to increase taxes. The pay-as-you-go approach is the most reasonable, equitable, and responsible method yet devised. It states explicitly where our new revenues will go. The proposal already agreed upon by the House Ways and Means Committee would increase revenues by approximately $49 billion over 3 years. This measure would close loopholes and reduce the decline in certain taxes, such as the windfall profits tax and cigarette tax. A similar proposal by the Senate Finance Committee, which the President has endorsed, would raise approximately the same amount through slightly different means.

All in all, I believe that this budget provides the fairest and most pragmatic method for reducing our deficits—which must be reduced in order to keep interest rates low and provide for a sustained economic recovery. It combines the essential ingredients: Savings in domestic spending, modest increases in defense and certain domestic programs, and modest revenue increases which do not adversely burden the American taxpayer. It is unlikely that a fairer and more pragmatic approach to the unpleasant task of reducing our deficit could be devised and accepted.

Throughout my statement I have tried to realistically appraise the various budget proposals in conjunction with the political climate. It is a fact of life that idealistic politicians, such as myself, must on occasion submit to reality; it is not always a pleasant task. There are, however, a group of our colleagues who, year after year, have given us an opportunity to glimpse another set of priorities and concerns which do not perceive the hard, cold facts of politics. I am referring to the budget submitted by the Congressional Black Caucus.

This budget is perhaps the most radical of the proposals presented. It would make actual decreases in defense spending while increasing key domestic programs. Its premise, as in past years, is that we must create a nation which, by its very nature, is secure. A nation where a good education for every citizen is guaranteed; a nation of employed people; a nation which cares for its weaker members—the elderly, the handicapped, the poor; a nation which places peace—real peace, not the mere absence of war—over the interest of its military industry. It is a worthy objective from which, even in the these more conservative, more pragmatic times, I shall not shrink.

Political reality, however, forces compromise, and compromise, in the end, does strengthen our democracy. The House Budget Committee's proposal asks for sacrifices from each segment, yet minimizes the hardship on those who can least afford it. Today I urge my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to set aside our partisan politics, to realistically assess our objectives for our diverse Nation, and adopt the budget submitted by the House Budget Committee. Thank you.●

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Chairman, the sentiment in my district is overwhelming for severe deficit reductions, in large measure through reductions in the President's military buildup.

There are only two of the eight budgets before us which begin to address those concerns—the budget being offered by Mr. DIXON of California and the one being offered by Mr. MCHUGH of New York. I will support these amendments and oppose the others. If neither of the two amendments is adopted, I will oppose final passage of the budget resolution.

Over 3 years, the Dixon budget reduces deficits $324 billion; McHugh's $262 billion. The other five alternatives range from $86 billion—the President's original proposal—to $234 billion. I want to vote for the two proposals which make the largest deficit reduction. Dixon reduces planned arms spending $203 billion over 3 years. McHugh, $140 billion. One other option proposes a $140 billion reduction. The others propose much, much less in the way of moderating the rush to arms. Both Dixon and McHugh offer more in the way of tax reform than the other proposals. For all these reasons, I support these two proposals—and oppose the others.

I still do not think the Congress has gotten the word on how very much the American people want deficits reduced and military waste stopped.

In mid-February, I polled the Ninth California Congressional District on whether they would increase, decrease, or keep the same spending levels in the major budget categories. I then asked these voters to add up their tax totals and spending totals and see what deficit figure they came up with.

There was a good response to the poll. Results are still coming in, because it was a somewhat hard poll to complete and because hundreds of people chose to write additional letters and comments. We have tabulated about 2,400 responses.

Mr. Chairman, do you know what the average deficit these voters came up with?

Thirty-nine billion dollars.

And here we sit debating deficits in most of the proposals of $150 to $180 billion.

We sit here worrying about what people will say about tax increases. But the response in my district clearly shows that citizens are willing to raise taxes to reduce the deficit. For example, 71 percent of the respondents tabulated support a rise in corporate income taxes. An even larger percentage, 77 percent, favor raising excise charges, such as those on tobacco.

As our country sinks deeper and deeper into debt, citizens plead for Congress to act courageously: To close tax loopholes, to crack down on unfair tax giveaways, and, ultimately, to raise taxes in a fair and even handed way.

The poll results send another urgent message: Reduce military spending. The people of California's Ninth District understand all too well that the Pentagon budget is out of control. And they are angry about it; 86 percent of those who responded want defense spending reduced; 86 percent. It is hard to imagine a clearer mandate for congressional action.

My constituents are willing to pay their fair share to reduce the deficit, but they will not blindly support more huge increases for the Defense Department. And, after all, how can Congress in good conscience ask citizens to help raise revenues while Pentagon spenders pay $9,000 for a 12-cent wrench?

On other points, overwhelmingly, people want reductions in funding of agricultural programs, especially price supports. Similarly, the vast majority of respondents favor a decrease in international affairs spending, with many expressing outrage at U.S. support of corrupt dictatorships. In other areas of Federal expenditures, such as education, health, welfare, and transportation, constituents were more supportive of current spending levels, though many urged a redoubling of efforts to eliminate waste and inefficiency.

I want to express my appreciation to all who responded to the survey. People gave serious thought to the questions and provided many interesting and useful insights. I hope the exercise was as educational for them as it was for me.

To conclude, Mr. Chairman, the Dixon and McHugh options are the only budget proposals which come close to meeting the wishes of the people of my district, and, I believe, the Nation.●

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises. Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MOAKLEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 280) revising the congressional budget for the U.S. Government for the fiscal year 1984 and setting forth the congressional budget for the U.S. Government for the fiscal years 1985, 1986, and 1987, pursuant to House Resolution 476, he reported the concurrent resolution back to the House.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

The question is on the concurrent resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 250, nays 168, not voting 14, as follows:

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY TO HAVE UNTIL 6 P.M. FRIDAY, APRIL 6, 1984, TO FILE REPORT ON H.R. 5041, JOINT RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT ACT OF 1984

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary may have until 6 p.m. Friday, April 6, 1984, to file its report on the bill, H.R. 5041, the Joint Research and Development Act of 1984.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. SAM B. HALL, JR. Mr. Speaker, as a result of an illness in my family, I was forced to miss rollcall votes Nos. 62, 63, and 64 on Tuesday, April 3, 1984. If present and voting I would have voted "yea" on rollcall No. 62, the conference report on H.R. 4072, Wheat Improvement Act of 1983. I would have voted "yea" on rollcall No. 63, H.R. 4707, Arizona Wilderness Act of 1984. Finally, I would have voted "yea" on rollcall No. 64, H.R. 5026, Truth in Lending Act amendments.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

(Mr. MICHEL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I have asked to proceed for 1 minute for the purpose of inquiring of the distinguished majority leader the program for the balance of today and next week.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, if the distinguished gentleman from Illinois would yield.

Mr. MICHEL. I am happy to yield.

Mr. WRIGHT. This concludes our business for today and for this week. It will be my purpose to ask unanimous consent shortly that when we adjourn today that we adjourn to meet at noon on Monday.

Next week on Monday we expect to have five or six suspensions. They include the following:

H.R. 1314, Reorganization Act Amendments of 1983.

H.R. 5155, Land Remote-Sensing Commercialization Act of 1984.

H.R. 5298, White House Council on Small Business.

S. 38, Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act amendments.

H.R. 4214, State Mineral Institutes Program.

Votes recorded on those suspensions will be postponed until the end of business on Tuesday.

On Tuesday we will consider H.R. 4900, the Panama Canal authorization, under an open rule, with 1 hour of general debate, and a bill, H.R. 7, extending and improving the Child Nutrition Act, subject to the granting of a rule.

We will then have recorded votes on any suspensions on which recorded votes have been demanded which had been debated on the previous day.

On Wednesday we suggest at this time that we meet at 3 p.m., but that is subject to change if it occurs to us collectively that it would be useful to meet earlier.

On Wednesday we would hope to take up H.R. 4170, the Tax Reform Act under a modified rule, with 4 hours of general debate.

On Thursday and the balance of the week we would meet at 11 o'clock and it is our purpose to take up the budget reconciliation bill, subject to the granting of a rule.

Conference reports, of course, may be called up at any time and Members should be on notice that it is at least possible that we might have a vote on the conference report on the supplemental authorization bill.

Mr. MICHEL. If I might inquire of the distinguished majority leader, he has scheduled here the Tax Reform Act for Wednesday and reconciliation the following day. Is there any possibility that the order of those two measures could be reversed? As the gentleman knows, there is a problem getting sufficient votes to pass a tax bill. Conceivably it might be helpful if there was reconciliation considered first, so that Members could know what would be done on the expenditure side before committing themselves for any tax bill.

Now, I am not saying that that is the controlling difference. I have not monitored the numbers that closely. It is just that I recognize, particularly on my own side the anxiety on the part of Members particularly with respect to voting for some expenditure reductions precedent to voting for a tax bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. Well, the suggestion being made by the gentleman from Illinois certainly is worthy of consideration. If there is some reason to believe that it would enhance our prospects for passage of the entire program next week, we most surely would be willing to consider that possibility with an open mind.

I do not want to set anything in concrete at this time, but neither would I close the door at all on the suggestion made by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MICHEL. Then might I also inquire if there is no change in that program and noting that there would be 4 hours of debate on the tax bill, plus debate on the rule, whether the majority leader would give consideration next week to maybe moving up the time for meeting, rather than 3 o'clock, as we did this week, meeting earlier so that we might conclude at a reasonable hour.

Mr. WRIGHT. We surely would give consideration to that. In fact, some conversation already has ensued.

I would like to maintain enough flexibility at the moment that we could make those judgments next week based upon what appears at that time to be the most propitious route to pursue.

I certainly would agree that it is a possibility that we might want to consider next week.

Mr. MICHEL. Then might I also inquire, is it the intention of the leadership that we would be concluding our business, if all goes according to schedule and plan next Thursday and that there would be no session on Friday, a week from tomorrow?

Mr. WRIGHT. What a pleasant thing to anticipate. That is something I think all of us would like to achieve and if we can complete this program, then we would look forward to doing that; however, I should not want to encourage Members to make irrevocable commitments on Friday next week, with the possibility we might have to be in session in order to complete this program. I think all Members on both sides of the aisle would like to be able to go home and say that this House at least has completed its work on the budget and those matters related directly to the budget in order to carry out those things to which we have committed ourselves in the vote today, both from the standpoint of the reconciliation bill and the tax bill.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHEL. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, the point the distinguished minority leader made about starting the program earlier, particularly when we are into taxes and reconciliation which are complicated matters that the House will wish to discuss and which will also occur undoubtedly in 1-minute speeches, I think the House would like to know at the soonest time what the intentions of the majority are so that it can regulate its business.

It is not a good idea to have surprises. It is nicer to know before we target our business for the weekend. If that is impossible, it is nicer to know as soon as possible in the new week what the intentions of the majority are, because there is lots of business going on around here.

Mr. WRIGHT. I agree with the gentleman. There is lots of business. I believe the gentleman's committee is meeting today to produce one part of this reconciliation bill. I think it would be well if we were to leave ourselves some flexibility to accomodate ourselves next week to the realities that develop. One of those realities, of course, lies in the gentleman's committee.

We think there is a good likelihood that we will revisit this and consider an earlier session on Wednesday.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHEL. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I understood there was some talk that we were going to have the equal access bill before us next week. I do not believe I heard that announced. Has that been put aside?

Mr. WRIGHT. If the gentleman will yield, that has been put aside under a mutual agreement of the members of several committees. It will be considered on the House floor. It will be granted the opportunity for full consideration and for Members to express their will on that bill at a later date, not next Monday, but on another occasion when we will be considering bills under suspension of the rules.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further, do I understand the majority leader to say we will have the bill under an open rule, rather than bringing it out under the Suspension Calendar?

Mr. WRIGHT. If the gentleman will yield, I did not suggest that nor intend to be so understood. At this time I know of no reason to suggest that it would not be eligible for consideration under suspension of the rules; but I am not privy to conversations that are taking place at this time.

I would simply say to the gentleman that an attempt is being made to reconcile problems that are encountered by members of various committees who feel that they have an interest in this legislation and that the legislation will be scheduled for our consideration and we will be given every opportunity to vote on it, quite possibly under suspension of the rules.

I am not at liberty to make that absolute commitment at this time nor to give an absolute date, but it is my expectation that at some time before the end of the month of May this bill will be before the House.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I thank the distinguished majority leader.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY, APRIL 9, 1984

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at noon on Monday, April 9, 1984.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

DISPENSING WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS ON WEDNESDAY NEXT

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business in order under the Calendar Wednesday rule be dispensed with on Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

PETER JOSEPH MURPHY, JR., 1924-84

(Mr. BOLAND asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to join with Chairman WHITTEN, Mr. ADDABBO, Mr. CONTE, and others in their comments about Pete Murphy, the staff director of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee, who died of cancer on Tuesday morning.

Pete Murphy combined all the qualities that made an outstanding member of the Appropriations Committee staff. He was hard working—often here on evenings and weekends. He was an expert budget technician—dedicated to uncovering the issues, that lay behind hundreds of millions, yea, billions of dollars of budget requests.

And Pete knew his subject matter as well as any one in this town. From research and development, through the maze of DOD procurement—Pete had a fine grasp of every program—whether it was the smallest handgun or the B-1B bomber. He was also responsible for the Appropriation Committee's review of the intelligence community, and worked closely with the staff and members of the House Select Committee on Intelligence.

His recommendations to the committee and to the Congress were marked with a thoroughness of review and a careful understanding of what was the right thing to do. And, Mr. Speaker, above all, Pete's integrity and his sense of honesty will be remembered. No one who knew him, or who worked with him—could not come away with a feeling that Pete was a "straight shooter."

Pete served in the Marine Corps in the Pacific during World War II. He saw action on both Guadalcanal and the invasion of Bougainville. He also participated in the Guam invasion and the invasion of Iwo Jima—where he was wounded in an assault on an Iwo Jima airfield.

Mr. Speaker, in John Kennedy's first state of the Union delivered from the podium behind me, he said:

> Let the public service be a proud and lively career. And let every man and woman who works in any area of our national government, in any branch, at any level, be able to say with pride and with honor in future years: "I served the U.S. Government in that hour of our nation's need."

Pete Murphy was that kind of a public servant—and his 22 years as a special agent with the Federal Bureau of Investigation—and his 16 years as a staff member of the House Appropriations Committee are a testament to President Kennedy's words.

Finally, although Pete devoted the best years of his life to his work—it was his family that he loved and cared for above all. He died at home with his family as he wanted to, and our deepest sympathy goes out to his wife Eve and their six children, Daniel P., Michael J., James P., Mary Ellen, Kathleen M., and Patricia.

We will all miss him very much.

THAILAND RECOGNIZED FOR REFUGEE EFFORTS

(Mr. McCOLLUM asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. McCOLLUM. Mr. Speaker, next week our Nation will have the pleasure of welcoming the distinguished Prem Tinsulanonda, Prime Minister of Thailand.

On this occasion, I would like to take a moment to recognize the Nation of Thailand's truly outstanding accomplishments in the area of refugee resettlement—a subject I am well acquainted with as a member of the Immigration Subcommittee.

For many years now, Thailand has been a haven for thousands and thousands of refugees from Vietnam, Kampuchea, and Laos who have fled Communist terror and oppression. For any nation, such an influx would pose enormous logistical and organizational problems and would require a major commitment on the part of that nation to undertake the challenge of overcoming them. Thailand has done exactly that. Faced with responsibility for the lives of thousands of homeless and desperate men, women, and children, Thailand has helped them begin new lives with competence, efficiency, and understanding. It has worked tirelessly to house, feed, and care for these refugees and find new homes in other countries.

Unfortunately, Thailand's exceptional efforts do not make the front pages of the newspapers very often; in fact, we rarely hear about the work being done every day of the year to bring order and stability back to the lives of refugees with no place to go. We do hear about the tragedies which all to often occur when people are forced to flee as quickly as they can in any manner that they are able to find. But, we do not hear about the families that are fortunate enough to find their way into a well-coordinated resettlement process such as Thailand's, and are quietly assisted in beginning a new life. There are thousands of these success stories taking place every year.

The nation of Thailand should be commended for the truly excellent humanitarian resettlement program it has developed and for its proven ability to handle what is indeed an awesome responsibility. Many nations have assisted the refugees of Vietnam, Kampouchea and Laos, but none more valiantly or with greater compassion. Faced with the challenge of meeting the needs of thousands of refugees without homes—and without hope—Thailand has risen to the occasion in a manner which should be an example to all nations. I urge my colleagues to join me in recognizing the nation of Thailand and its outstanding contribution to humanity.

CHEATING THE VOTERS ON THE EVENING NEWS

(Mr. WIRTH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call your attention to an editorial in today's New York Times. The editorial chastises the three television networks for projecting the winner in Tuesday's New York Presidential primary long before all polls had closed.

Election projections before polls are closed do not inform voters, they discourage them. The empirical evidence clearly shows that voters are much less likely to exercise their franchise when they are told who has already won the election. Early projections do not contribute in any positive way to our democratic form of government—they exploit it.

Mr. Speaker, I am very frustrated by the network's competitive drive to be first to project a winner. This blatant irresponsibility is an egregious interference in our Nation's electoral process.

I urge my colleagues to read today's New York Times' editorial.

[From the New York Times, Apr. 5, 1984]

DEMOCRACY ENLARGED; ALSO POLLUTED—

CHEATING THE VOTERS ON THE EVENING NEWS

Sometimes, to those of us in the print branch of the news business, television can be an exasperating cousin. We share many interests and problems with TV news and just two days ago advocated freeing its political coverage from Government regulation. But that very night, election night in New York—and hours before the polls close—the networks were pronouncing magisterially that it was a big night for Walter Mondale. Don't they see this as an abuse of the vote? Don't they hear the properly angry reaction bubbling up around the country?

The issue is not accuracy. The Tuesday reports, based on exit polls, were correct. And the issue should not be exit polling, an invaluable tool for finding out why people vote the way they do. The issue is the abuse of exit polls.

Besides analyzing the vote, exit polls can be used to anticipate the results before the voting has ended. And if the findings are reported while people are still voting, that risks infecting the outcome. What are people apt to do when they hear that their candidate's way ahead—or behind? Not vote. And that can alter the outcome, if not for those candidates then for others on the ballot.

TV news knows all that, and responsible broadcasters assert that they will wait until the voting booths close before divulging their exit polls. But they are cheating on that resolve, as can be seen in excepts from the 7 o'clock news Tuesday night.

The baldest report was on NBC: "In New York, where the polls are still open, Mondale appears to be winning by a decisive margin. Interviews with voters leaving the polling places indicate that Mondale is the first choice of most groups." Note the words winning and decisive. The language was more measured on CBS ("This may be a big night for Walter Mondale and Jesse Jackson") and ABC "It appears to be going well for Walter Mondale"). Appears from what? On all three networks, the point was unmistakable: Sure, dear viewer, there are two hours of voting left, but never mind, things are all wrapped up.

Democracy depends on a free press because the public needs unfettered access to news. But democracy also depends on an untainted vote, and premature reporting of exit polls can taint the vote. Fearing that, Washington state passed a law last year to keep poll-takers away from voters, a law that this newspaper and others are challenging in Federal court. Florida and Hawaii have passed similar laws; Massachusetts is thinking about it.

Such regulation is deeply offensive because it inserts a governmental nose into reporting and because exit polls, which the Times conducts with CBS, contribute so much to public understanding of the electoral process. The polls deserve protection—and the best protection would be for broadcast journalists to report them responsibly, which, most of all, means after the voting has ended.

If broadcasters keep rushing to use exit polls to predict that so-and-so will win, they'll unleash an avalanche of outrage. That would risk wiping out the good, irreplaceable data about the vote, along the good, irreplaceable data about the vote, along with the bad, and for what? Does any TV news executive believe that would improve political reporting?

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. CORCORAN) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. CORCORAN. Mr. Speaker, due to out-of-town speaking commitments, I was not present and voting when the House considered various legislative business on March 28 and 29. If I had been present, I would have voted in the following way:

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 28

On a motion to approve the House Journal of Tuesday, March 27, "yea."

On passage of the bill to authorize $7.5 billion for programs of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (H.R. 5154), "yea."

On passage of House Joint Resolution 517, Department of Housing and Urban Development, fiscal year 1984 urgent supplemental appropriations, "yea."

On adoption of House Resolution 443, Hunger Committee funding, "nay."

On adoption of the rule to H.R. 4841, Coast Guard authorization, "yea."

On passage of House Resolution 4841, "yea."●

EXCHANGE STABILIZATION FUND: SOUP KITCHEN FOR WORLD'S LARGEST BANKS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Colorado (Mr. BROWN) is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, the Treasury has announced it will be using the Exchange Stabilization Fund to finance $300,000,000 of the overdue interest payments owed by Argentina to United States and foreign bankers.

The Exchange Stabilization Fund was originally established in 1934 and was designed to engage in currency intervention to stabilize the U.S. dollar.

Why is it we have turned this enormous fund into a soup kitchen for the world's biggest banks?

Is it because Argentina is unable to make its current interest payment? Newsweek reports that Argentina, "is thought to hold $1 billion or more in foreign exchange reserves." While Argentina has enormous problems with its foreign debts, it clearly has the assets to make this current interest payment.

Are we bailing out the banks who are Argentina's creditors because they are so impoverished that they must stand in the U.S. Treasury's soup kitchen line? The lastest issue of Business Week reports the following 1983 profits for Argentina's largest U.S. creditors:

Citicorp, $860 million, up 19 percent from last year; Manufacturers Hanover Trust, $337 million, up 14 percent; J. P. Morgan, $460 million, up 17 percent; Chase Manhattan Bank, $429 million, up 40 percent; Chemical Bank of New York, $305.6 million, up 27 percent; Bank of America, $390 million, down 1 percent.

Evidently, this welfare program uses an unusual income eligibility standard.

We are assured that this is not a $300 million loan, but a swap. Given the value of the dollar in international transactions, what could Argentina offer us that would be equal in value? Why Argentine pesos, of course.

These are the same pesos that are not sound enough for Argentina to use in paying off its foreign debts. No doubt these pesos will come in handy if we have to draw on the Exchange Stabilization Fund to stabilize our own currency.

By the U.S. Government's insuring that foreign loans will be repaid, the U.S. taxpayer is forced to assume the risk of these loans, in effect, subsidizing them.

If our experience in recent years has taught us anything, it is that subsidizing something begets more of it. Subsidizing the export of U.S. capital, as the Treasury is doing, will intensify our capital shortage—not alleviate it.

Subsidizing the U.S. banks in this instance will encourage the making of unsecured loans overseas—not discourage them.

The Treasury's misappropriation of our country's assets not only cheats the hardworking American taxpayer, but also rewards irresponsible lenders.

The simple fact is that the U.S. Exchange Stabilization Fund is being misused to stimulate the export of American capital, capital that is vitally needed at home.

The Fund is being used to bail out large banks who have made unsecured loans. It is being used to reward bad management at our billion-dollar banks at the expense of the working men and women of this country.

The vast majority of American bankers hope to gain by hard work and understand they may suffer for their mistakes. Why should our largest banks be any different?

Mr. Speaker, Rudyard Kipling might have described it as follows:

If you can keep your capital when all about you are losing theirs, and blaming it on you;
If you can get the government to bail you out, no matter what you do;

If you make loans to Argentina, there is no need to fret;
For billion-dollar bankers can saddle others
with their debt;

If you can make one heap of your nation's earnings,
And risk it on one turn of pitch-and-toss,
And lose and lose and tap again the public trough;

If you take the chance of profits, but never take a risk;

Let the taxpayer take the loss while you dine on lobster bisque;

For you are a billion-dollar banker and there is a safety net for you,

Yours is the earth and everything that's in it,

No matter what bad loans you do.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS EMPLOYEES' PROTECTION ACT OF 1984

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Colorado (Mr. WIRTH) is recognized for 10 minutes.

● Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Telecommunications Employees' Protection Act of 1984. Joining me in this effort are my colleagues Mr. CLAY, Mr. DINGELL, Mr. PERKINS, Mr. WAXMAN, Mr. TAUKE, Mr. GORE, Mr. LELAND, Mr. BATES, Mr. MARKEY, Mr. BRYANT, and Mr. OBERSTAR.

It is often overlooked that divestiture of the telephone industry affects people as well as corporations, money, rate schedules, and equipment. As a result of the breakup of AT&T, thousands of workers who have helped provide the United States with the best telephone service in the world will be transferred to new companies within the telephone industry.

This legislation would correct a problem that could deny some of these wage earners credit for their prior experience in the telephone industry.

Prior to divestiture, telephone company employees could move from one company within the Bell System to another, and take their accrued service credit with them. Accrued service credit is the basis for determining pension rights, as well as seniority and the ability to bid on vacations, shifts, and other bargained-for benefits.

As a result of the divestiture of AT&T, however, accrued service credit for most employees is protected only if they transfer from one Bell company to another Bell, or to AT&T, during 1984. Bell System employees who move from one Bell company to another after this year would lose their accrued years of service credited toward pensions and other benefits. For those employees, that would mean reduced pension benefits, or the loss of seniority.

The Telecommunications Employees' Protection Act provides that Bell System employees who move from one Bell company to another, or between a Bell company and AT&T, will be able to take their accrued service credit with them—regardless of when the move occurs. The legislation assures a continuation of the tradition of "portability" of service credit between the telephone companies for people who were working for AT&T or the Bell System prior to divestiture. It does not, however, require a Bell company or AT&T to hire employees who leave their current jobs with the telephone industry.

At my urging, a virtually identical provision was made part of H.R. 4102, the Universal Telephone Service Preservation Act of 1983. That legislation passed the House last November, but was stalled in the Senate after massive lobbying by AT&T and the local Bell companies. The House felt very strongly that it would be unfair for telephone workers to pay a potentially high price, particularly in pension benefits, for a corporate reorganization that neither they nor the Congress sought.

Because of the dynamic changes in the industry to date and the entirely unprecedented changes since January 1, 1984, Congress must take action to see that no harm comes to the men and women of the telephone industry. It is inequitable for an employee who has years of service with a former subsidiary of the Bell System to lose pension and seniority credit when he or she transfers to another part of the former Bell System, just because the Department of Justice-AT&T divestiture plan did not include this protection.

In the past, with any governmentally imposed restructuring of an industry, Congress has protected the pensions and other rights of employees who are affected. This was the case with airline deregulation and railroad deregulation. Employees of the telephone industry deserve no less.

Communications bills considered in earlier Congresses also provided protection for telephone company employees' benefits. Legislation considered in the 97th Congress, H.R. 5158, contained extensive employee protection provisions. Prior bills—such as H.R. 6121 in 1980—also contained protections. Indeed, legislation reported by this committee in 1943, amending section 222 of the Communications Act to allow Western Union to absorb the old Postal Telegraph system, protected employees.

In addition to securing the pension rights of telephone company employees, I had hoped that we could also take a significant step to assure the continued availability of telephone service at reasonable rates for all Americans, a goal that the House affirmed by the passage of H.R. 4102. My preference would have been to combine employee protection in a single bill with the establishment of a fund to subsidize lifeline telephone service for the poor, the elderly, and the handicapped.

The creation of a "lifeline fund" was part of H.R. 4102, and, like pension portability, it received strong bipartisan support. A similar lifeline subsidy was included in S. 1660. Moreover, throughout the debate on these bills, the telephone industry repeatedly stated its support for a mechanism to insure lifeline service for customers with low or fixed incomes, while adamantly opposing other key provisions of those bills.

Notwithstanding this longstanding support, key players in the communications industry have changed their position on the lifeline issue, and some Senators have expressed an unwillingness to consider legislation to create a lifeline fund, even if the legislation were strictly limited to that. Adding such a fund to an employee protection bill could jeopardize final passage of the latter.

While I see no good reason why Congress cannot act to assure affordable telephone service for all Americans during this Congress, I do not want to place Bell employees' pension rights at risk. Because the Senate and the industry refuse to support a lifeline provision, I have restricted this legislation to the employee protection issue.

The Telecommunications Employees' Protection Act of 1984 enjoys the strong support of the Communications Workers of America and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. It is acceptable to AT&T.

I urge my House colleagues to join me and the other cosponsors of this important legislation. The issue is simply not a question of dollars and cents. The issue is justice and fairness for working people. We must make sure that the rights of telephone company employees are protected.

The text of the bill follows:

H.R. 5391

A bill to extend certain treatment afforded employees in the communications industry who transfer between various telephone companies affected by the January 1, 1984, reorganization

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Telecommunications Employees' Protection Act of 1984".

EMPLOYEE PROTECTION

SEC. 2. Notwithstanding any provisions of the divestiture interchange agreement to the contrary, in the case of any change in employment on or after Jaunary 1, 1985, by a covered employee, the recognition of service credit, and enforcement of such recognition, shall be governed in the same manner and to the same extent as provided under the divestiture interchange agreement for a change in employment by a covered employee during calendar year 1984.

EMPLOYEES COVERED

SEC. 3. For purposes of this Act, a covered employee is an individual—

(1) who is an employee of an entity subject to the modified final judgment,

(2) who is serving in an eligible position, and

(3) who (A) on December 31, 1983, was an employee of any such entity serving in an eligible position or (B) was a former employee with rehire or recall rights on such date and is rehired during the period of the employee's rehire or recall rights.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 4. For purposes of this Act—

(1) the term "service credit" means service credit for benefit accrual, vesting, and eligibility for any benefits under any pension plan, or any other employee benefits, provided by the divestiture interchange agreement, including the interchange and treatment of associated benefit obligations and assets;

(2) the term "change in employment" means the commencement of employment of a covered employee by an entity subject to the modified final judgment after the termination of employment (with or without a break in service) of such individual from an eligible position within another entity subject to the modified final judgment;

(3) the term "eligible position" means any position (A) which is not a supervisor position, within the meaning of section 2(11) of the National Labor Relations Act (29 U.S.C. 152(11)) or (B) the annual base pay rate for which is not more than $50,000, adjusted by the percentage increase in the consumer price index since December 31, 1983;

(4) the term "modified final judgment" means the judgment of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia in the case, United States against Western Electric, et alia, No. 82-0192, as modified;

(5) the term "entity subject to the modified final judgment" means any carrier divested as a result of such judgment, the corporation owning such carrier before divestiture, or any interchange company (as defined in the divestiture interchange agreement) excluding any subsidiary of such company other than any such subsidiary which was established as of December 31, 1983, and which participates in a defined benefit pension plan maintained by such interchange company;

(6) the term "divestiture interchange agreement" refers to the agreement between entities subject to the modified final judgment which was executed as of November 1, 1983, and which provides for mutual reciprocal recognition of service credit; and

(7) the term "consumer price index" means the Consumer Price Index (all items—United States city average) published monthly by the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

COORDINATION WITH OTHER BENEFIT-RELATED PROVISIONS

SEC. 5. Nothing in this Act shall be construed to limit benefits which would otherwise be available to any individual, whether provided under the modified final judgment, under applicable law, or otherwise.●

THE CORPORATE COMMUNITY INVESTMENT AND JOBS PRESERVATION ACT OF 1984

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. COYNE) is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. COYNE. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced today the Corporate Community Investment and Jobs Preservation Act.

Since the Sherman Act became law on July 2, 1890, the Federal Government has measured whether the combination or merger of large corporations serves the public interest. The thrust of antitrust law, as developed in the Clayton Act of 1914 and subsequent legislation, has been to insure that the average citizen is well-served in the marketplace as the result of a combination or merger.

The question we face today is whether we can address the economic conditions of the 1980's with laws rooted in the 1890's. Although the mergers were large at the end of the last century, those who laid the cornerstone of our antitrust laws could not have imagined the nature of the American economy as we near the next century. The acquisition of one large corporation by another can now affect not only the economy in general, but cities and regions in particular.

Mergers won can mean jobs lost. Some would argue that the merger of big companies produces many winners, including management, stockholders, accountants, lawyers, and stock speculators. In certain mergers, however, including the proposed merger of Standard Oil of California and Gulf Oil of Pittsburgh, there are certain losers. If Socal closes or phases out the Gulf corporate headquarters in Pittsburgh, as it most assuredly will do if this merger goes ahead, an already hard-pressed city will receive another blow to the local economy. The city may lose the 1,800 employees at Gulf. This would mean the loss of $75 million in wages to a local economy which, despite a national upturn, remains in the grip of double digit unemployment. A city struggling to make fiscal ends meet could lose between $300,000 and $500,000 in local wage taxes contributed by Gulf employees, this from a total wage tax revenue of $57 million.

There may indeed be winners in this merger deal as well. Mr. T. Boone Pickens and his group of stock speculators, the people who started the ball rolling in their attempt at a hostile takeover of Gulf, stand to profit more than $700 million for doing very little actual work. They win.

Pittsburgh loses. Gulf contributed more than $360,000 to the city's United Way in 1983. More than 50 charitable organizations received over $2 million in contributions from Gulf that year. The local public television station received $4 million to produce a widely acclaimed series. Without a Gulf corporate headquarters, the city can expect to lose these charitable contributions.

Corporate capital today can move with the speed of an electronic funds transfer. The capital for a community, embodied in the people who live, work, and pay taxes in a city, is far less mobile. Those who remain behind when a big corporation shuts down operations as a result of a merger are faced with a reduced tax base, higher unemployment costs and an increased demand on local, State, and Federal economic development funds. In such an instance, the Federal Government is usually called upon to aid what becomes known as a distressed city. The Federal commitment is there, as it most certainly is in the case of merger review for possible antitrust violations.

Michael Pertschuk, a commissioner of the Federal Trade Commission, noted in the House Energy and Commerce Committee merger hearings March 21 that:

> Since the Sherman Act was passed in 1890, there has clearly not been an unqualified right for shareholders of one company to sell out to another if the combination would violate a larger national interest.

The Federal Government assuredly has the right to intervene in a merger when such action is not in the national interest. But nowhere in current law is there a requirement that the Government measure the economic impact on a particular community before it allows a merger to go ahead. Times have changed. If we are to insure fairness in matters of human capital as well as economic capital, we must broaden the Federal responsibility to include a review of community impact.

The Corporate Community Investment and Jobs Preservation Act would bring our laws up to date by requiring such an assessment. In looking at the facts in a proposal merger, the Federal Government would consider not only the relative health of our overall economy but of individual communities as well.

The act I introduce today would establish a three-step process for certain large corporations which, under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Act of 1976, are required to file a premerger notification with the Federal Trade Commission and the Antitrust Division of the Justice Department. To be covered by the act, the acquired company must have sales or assets in excess of $10 million and the acquiring company must have assets or sales in excess of $100 million.

First, if a corporate merger can be expected to eliminate more than 100 jobs in a particular locality the corporations involved must file a community impact statement with the Federal Trade Commission. The statement would describe the business at which the reduction in employment will occur and give reasons for the reduction. The statement must also contain a plan to minimize the effect of the reduction on employees of the establishment eliminating jobs and on the local government in which such establishment is located. The statement would also describe the economic status of the corporation losing jobs, including the level of profitability, listing plans for future investment, employment and production. The number of employees losing their jobs due to the merger would be stated. The statement would go to the Federal Trade Commission, the Department of Justice, the employees of the corporations involved in the merger, and to local governments which have jurisdiction over the corporations involved.

Second, after the community impact statement is filed, employees of the corporations and local governments may petition the Federal Trade Commission to hold hearings so that the statement can be investigated. In the course of the public hearings, taking testimony from local government officials and others, the Commission shall study the economic reasons for the employee reduction described in the community impact statement and shall estimate the extent of economic loss to the employees and the community.

Third, once the investigation is concluded, the FTC shall prepare a report on the findings, including a recommendation as to whether legal action should begin to halt the merger. If the FTC finds the merger will have a substantial adverse effect on employment in a particular locality, the tax deduction for interest on indebtedness incurred by one corporation to acquire another would not be allowed.

This legislation reflects an important economic reality of the 1980's. Actions by large corporations sometimes affect not only the people who own stock in the corporations but the people who live in the cities and towns where the corporate headquarters and the various plants are located as well. When a large corporation decides to brighten its bottom line at the expense of a community, the Federal Government has a legitimate role in deciding whether such an action is in the public interest. Corporations may pull up stakes, or simply disappear in a merger, but the Government is forced to pick up the costs in the form of increased loans to the fiscally distressed locality, more urban development grants to reverse commercial deterioration, and more payments for unemployment. For the Federal Government, reviewing a proposed merger's impact on a local economy is simply good public policy.

The Federal Government is, of course, very much involved in the merger process, and not simply at the point of review by the Federal Trade Commission and the Department of Justice. One of the biggest factors in promoting recent consolidations has been the complimentary nature of the Federal Tax Code, especially that provision which allows a tax deduction for money borrowed to acquire another corporation.

For those who may consider this subsidy to be a minor one, it is worth noting that, according to one estimate, the interest deductions for the SocalGulf deal alone will cost the Federal Treasury $750 million a year.

The implications of this mammoth subsidy are broader than a loss of funds to the Treasury. Robert J. Samuelson wrote recently in the Washington Post:

Other tax provisions entrench the power of existing firms by giving them preferred access to investment funds. When profitable companies borrow, they deduct interest costs from their taxes which—because the top corporate rate is 46 per cent—means the true interest rate is about half the market level. New firms (with no profits and, therefore, no deductions) must pay the full rate. And because dividends are subject to both corporate and personal taxes, existing firms have an incentive to retain profits. This leaves less capital for new companies.

The ability to deduct interest on funds used to acquire another corporation, for a profitable large corporation, can mean a real interest rate well below the market average. Is this the business the Federal Government should be in, the subsidization of large corporations, even if they eliminate jobs, while smaller, job creating firms are unable to obtain similar financing?

I would suggest the Federal Government should not be a partner to mergers which have adverse economic consequences for local communities. The Corporate Community Investment and Jobs Preservation Act reflects this view by denying the deductibility of interest in those mergers which have a substantial adverse effect on employment in a particular locality. The determination of this effect would be as a result of public hearings and investigation of the community impact statement filed by the parties involved.

Mr. Speaker, we cannot rely on the laws of the 1890's to resolve the economic questions of the 1980's. A new way of doing business requires a new way of governing. This act, by allowing local residents to initiate public hearings and investigation of a merger which would affect their community, continues an important trend toward public/private partnership developed at the Federal and local level in the 1970's.

I urge my colleagues to join me in support of the Corporate Community Investment and Job Preservation Act of 1984.

At this point, I would like to include in the RECORD the text of the legislation:

H.R. 5374

A bill to require community impact statements by certain corporations involved in mergers which will result in reducing the number of persons employed in any community by at least 100 individuals, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Corporate Community Investment and Jobs Preservation Act of 1984".

SEC. 2. If two or more corporations propose to merge, if with respect to such merger such corporations are required to file a notification under section 7A of the Act of October 15, 1914 (15 U.S.C. 18a) (commonly referred to as the "Clayton Act"), and if the merger may be reasonably expected to reduce the number of employees employed in an establishment of such a corporation in the county, city, or other jurisdiction in which the establishment is located by more than 100 employees, each corporation to be involved in the proposed merger shall file, in accordance with section 2, a community impact statement. A community impact statement shall include—

(1) the nature of the business of the establishment of the corporation at which the reduction of employees will take place,

(2) the reasons for such reduction,

(3) any alternative to such reduction,

(4) a plan to minimize the effects of such reduction on the remaining employees in such establishment and on any unit of general local government having jurisdiction over the area in which such reduction will take place,

(5) the economic circumstances of such corporation including the level of profitability of the operation at the establishment of such corporation at which the reduction in employment will take place and any plan for future investments, employment, and production at such establishment, and

(6) the number of employees who will lose their employment as a result of the merger.

SEC. 3. The community impact statement required by the first section shall be submitted to the Federal Trade Commission, the Department of Justice, to the employees and representatives of each labor organization representing such employees at each corporation involved in the merger, and to each unit of general local government having jurisdiction over an area in which establishment of each such corporation is located. The statement shall be filed on the same date a notification respecting the merger is filed under section 7A of the Act of October 15, 1914.

SEC. 4. If, within fourteen days of the submittal of a community impact statement under section 3, the Federal Trade Commission receives a request by a unit of local government which has received the community impact statement or by at least 10 percent of the employees of a corporation which filed such statement, the Commission shall conduct an investigation into, and hold public hearings on, the community impact statement. Such an investigation shall include—

(1) the economic reasons for the proposed reduction in employment described in the statement,

(2) the estimated extent of the economic losses to the employees employed in the establishment in which such reduction will occur, including the number of employees who will lose their employment as a result of the merger,

(3) the estimated extent of any economic loss, including a decline in the tax base, of any unit of general local government having jurisdiction over such establishment and any economic loss to any person in the geographic area in which such establishment is located, and

(4) the recommendations of any such unit of local government, any labor union representing employees in each corporation to be involved in the proposed merger, or any other person respecting the proposed merger.

SEC. 5. After an investigation is concluded under section 4, the Federal Trade Commission shall prepare and publish a report containing the findings of the investigation and recommendations as to whether or not legal action should be taken to halt such merger.

SEC. 6. Section 279 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to interest on indebtedness incurred by a corporation to acquire stock or assets of another corporation) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(k) SPECIAL RULE FOR OBLIGATIONS ISSUED FOR CORPORATE MERGERS ADVERSELY AFFECTING EMPLOYMENT.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—Subsection (b) shall not apply to any obligation issued in connection with a corporate merger with respect to which the Federal Trade Commission has made a finding described in paragraph (2).

"(2) FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION FINDING.—The finding referred to in paragraph (1) is a finding by the Federal Trade Commission, made after an investigation held under section 4 of the Corporate Community Investment and Jobs Preservation Act of 1984, that a proposed corporate merger will have a substantial adverse effect on employment in a county, city, or other jurisdiction.".

ADJUSTMENT IN REIMBURSEMENT RATES FOR HOSPICE CARE

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. COYNE). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California (Mr. PANETTA) is recognized for 10 minutes.

● Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation along with Representative BILL GRADISON to address a very serious problem facing hospice programs seeking to participate in the hospice reimbursement benefit under medicare. This legislation would increase the payment rate for routine home care under the hospice program. Home care is the most essential component in the delivery of hospice care, and the routine home care rate has caused the most difficulty to hospice programs.

At present, hospice programs are reimbursed at a rate of $46.25 for routine home care. This legislation would increase this rate to $53.17. This is the rate which was included in the proposed regulations issued by the Department of Health and Human Services issued in August 1983.

The problem is that hospice programs are finding it very difficult to participate in the hospice program under the current payment rates. The payment level, particularly for the routine home care rate, has proven to be critically low and places great financial hardships on programs participating in the hospice benefit. At the same time, many hospice programs are being discourage from seeking hospice certification because of the inappropriate reimbursement rates. Hospice groups have indicated that the rate of $53.17 is closer to their actual cost.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, Representative GRADISON and I have sought to obtain from the Department of Health and Human Services final cost data from the hospice demonstration projects and how the payment rates in the final regulations were formulated. A formal request was made in a letter to Secretary Heckler on February 7. To date, however, we have received no response from the Department regarding this request.

While we are not certain that the rates in the proposed regulations are in fact accurate, we feel that the routine home care rate will give hospice programs a better chance of operating under the hospice benefit. Our goal must be to facilitate participation in the hospice program.

This legislation will also require the Secretary to make adjustments in the routine home care rate and other hospice rates after a 24-month period. Such adjustments are to be based on cost data received from the participating hospice programs. The 24-month period should give the Department sufficient time to retrieve and analyze cost data and formulate more appropriate rates—whether they are higher or lower.

The hospice benefit has been widely supported in Congress on a bipartisan basis. However, the administration has not been sensitive or cooperative in the implementation of this benefit. We here in Congress must continue to support hospice care as an alternative mode of caring for the terminally ill and must work to insure effective implementation of the medicare benefit. I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.

Following is the text of this legislation:

H.R. 5386

A bill to amend part A of title XVIII of the Social Security Act with respect to the payment rates for routine home care and other services included in hospice care

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 1814(i)(1) of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 1395f(i)(1)) is amended—

(1) by inserting "(A)" after "(i)(1)", and

(2) by adding at the end the following new subparagraph:

"(B) In establishing rates of payment for hospice care under subparagraph (A), the Secretary shall not establish a rate of payment which is less than $53.17 per day for routine home care furnished during the 24-month period beginning with the first month beginning after the date of the enactment of this subparagraph.

"(C) The Secretary after the 24-month period, shall not less often than annually review and, as appropriate, adjust the payment rate for routine home care and for other services included in hospice care based on the costs that are reasonable and related to the costs of furnishing such care and services and shall report to Congress periodically on such review and such adjustments and on the adequacy of the rates under this paragraph in ensuring participation by an adequate number of hospice programs under this title.".●

UPDATE ON MORTGAGE ASSISTANCE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. GONZALEZ) is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, I have addressed the House through and because of this privilege known as the opportunity of special orders, and I have directed my attention, principally, to what I consider to be the crying, burgeoning needs arising from the midst of our constituency, as best as it is possible to register their reflection.

I pride myself in keeping as intimate a contact as it is humanly possible with the constituency of the 20th Congressional District of Texas. I return to the district every weekend and though that is fragmentary and I realize from past experience, where I have served on the city council 3 years, in the State senate 5 years and have a pretty good idea of the challenge of the chore or task or presumption of trying to call one's self a representative, in this case of 500,000 multiple pluralistic, highly diverse constituents; but I do.

And I have spoken out up to now like sort of a coyote out in the bush country; braying to the moon at midmight. But the fact remains that what this House approved under the insistence and leadership of the Subcommittee on Housing and Urban Development of the House of Representatives, the largest subcommittee in the entire Congress on either side of the Capitol, passed it out under emergency conditions, finally last May, with an overwhelming majority vote of more than 115 votes margin.

Yet it lies languishing, dying on the vine by expressed intent and premeditation by the Senate leadership and the administration that is adamantly against this type of legislation.

It has to do with a reaffirmation of our faith in the average American family's dream to own a home, to have something that they could call their own, and identified irretrievably with the soil and the country, and that is homeownership.

So that these thousands, hundreds of thousands of American families that just since last May have lost their homes under the foreclosure hammer, have been left with no hope and in utter dismay, and in areas of particularly extreme distress, one being, for instance, Pueblo, Colo.

Even now the residual litigation that has at least obstructed the dispossession, still records the loss of homes at a tremendous rate.

Last year at this time, we were deliberating and finally passing the enactment of the home mortgage loan assistance program, a very modest modicum of a lifeline of help, nothing anywhere near as generous as the Home Owners Loan Corporation apparatus that fortunately the Congress then had faith in the American people first and foremost, saw fit to pass during the Depression year, in which, there is no question about it, the Treasury certainly was broke.

But that faith was more than reaffirmed when at the close of the doors of the Home Owners Loan Corporation, it recorded a very handsome profit for the taxpayers. That meant that those American families had kept faith; they paid back their loans just as soon as they were able to.

This is exactly what I am sure—if not 100 percent—99.9 percent of the present-day American families, that the Congress so callously, and our President so in heedless disregard of humanity, have turned their backs on. This bill is over there in the Senate without even a consideration of a hearing or at least some attempt to focus attention; utter silence from those that even they may not have power and control of the Senate certainly have a voice and a vote and a presence; not a whimper; not a voice; not a vote.

And I am saying that no matter what we can wallow in the discussions, such as today on the so-called first budget resolution, we can pass out these egregiously unjust tax bills, with euphoniously sounding names like tax reduction and reform or economic recovery tax program. Who in the world ever heard such Alice in Wonderland play on words, not to mention Orwellian 1984, when a tax bill becomes an instrument of prosperity.

The power to tax is still the power to destroy. And particularly in a nation where the leadership and the very interested agents of the people themselves turn their backs callously in heedless disregard of their crying needs.

When does Government and when should Government intervene? Is it not the American concept that only where the individual for himself cannot help himself. That is exactly all we are asking in the home mortgage loan emergency assistance program, with terrible terms, that I myself would not have asked but compelled under the necessity of seeing the approval of the majority had a fixed interest rate of payment 10 percent. That is usurious.

Nevertheless, I know families that would love to have that opportunity in order to be able to save their homes.

So I am going to remind my colleagues each one of us has a couple of U.S. Senators from our individual States to not forget what we overwhelmingly saw as a critical need, an emergency, to die on the vine in a Senate that does not even have the courtesy of respect for the House procedures and judgment of the House to even consider the matter.

Let them vote it up. Let them vote it down, but let us consider it.

I also brought out in my statements here the comparison between what is happening now, such things as we just heard from our colleague on the other side of the aisle, the speaker before last, referring to the so-called bailout of the Argentina situation, which the Secretary of the Treasury denies is a bailout. Says why nothing at all, this will not cost the taxpayers money because it comes out of the SWAP, the stabilization fund.

Well, what is that fund? That is a Treasury fund. There is a similar fund over in the Federal Reserve Board. But where is the money from? Not from the moon. It certainly is not from any other country. It is U.S. taxpayer source. It is taxpayer money. So what does he mean when they make a guarantee through the SWAP fund of over $300 million that it is not going to cost the taxpayer. That is an insult to the intelligence of any American.

But be that as it may. What I am pointing out is that the similarity of complaint can be duplicated. I am going to read into the RECORD something that was printed right at Depression time, 6 months before 1929's Black Friday. That is when everything broke in October 1929.

I happen to be a Depression kid and therefore remember vividly, though I was a child in school, I remember vividly and so when somebody says "Black Friday," I know exactly the day and the month and the year.

But 6 months before that, a very distinguished Presidential panel—just like one we recently heard from—it was entitled the Presidential Commission on Recent Economic Changes, reported to President Herbert Hoover this way. I am quoting directly from the report:

> We have a boundless field before us and seems only to have touched the fringe of our potentiality. Our situation is fortunate. Our momentum is remarkable.

The other day, to be exact, in the March 30, last Friday's New York Times, page D-1, business section, there is an article, "Economic Index Up Strong, 0.7 Percent. February Rise was 17th in the Last 18 Months." And it goes on and reports the Department of Commerce, the Secretary of Commerce, talking about what a bullish situation, but there is one line in all of that that says, "However, the imbalance,"—the trade deficit, our imbalance in our accounting in trade, export-import—"reached the highest peak ever, astronomical sum." It was just a little sideline.

So then I was reminded of another New York Times article on Monday, June 23, 1931. The Depression had really hit by then. We had the same thing we had now. Businesses were going under in droves, banks were closing. They are today. Just in Texas alone in less than a month we have had about half a dozen, more on the way. And here is this article in the New York Times, June 23, 1931:

> Led by New York, tremendous buying enthusiasm swept over the security and the commodity markets of the world yesterday in response to weekend developments reflecting favorable reception of President Herbert Hoover's proposal for a one-year moratorium on war debts and reparations. Pronounced strength developed in the German bond list. The gains ranging from 2 to 13½ points.

Then the last sentence, just like this last sentence in this article this year, this last week about the imbalance being so terrible: "U.S. Government bonds fail to participate in the move. All of them closing behind minus signs." End of quote of the New York Times article of June 23, 1931.

The New York Times article follows:

[From the New York Times, Mar. 30, 1984]

ECONOMIC INDEX UP STRONG 0.7 PERCENT

FEBRUARY RISE WAS 17TH IN LAST 18 MONTHS

WASHINGTON, March 29.—The index of leading economic indicators, which is the Government's main economic forecasting gauge, rose a healthy seven-tenths of 1 percent in February, prompting the White House to assert that the economy was "still on a roll."

The Commerce Department, which reported the gain, said February's rise was the 17th in the last 18 months.

Last month's rise was less than the 1 percent January increase but well above December's advance of only two-tenths of 1 percent. The index was unchanged in November.

The gains in the leading indicators in January and February reflect the surprisingly strong economic growth in the country. A preliminary Government estimate last week put the annual growth rate at 7.2 percent in the current quarter, which ends Saturday.

"Today's economic news provides strong evidence that the nation's economy is still on a roll," said Larry M. Speakes, a Presidential spokesman. "The indicators show the economy is positioned for a strong and manageable level of growth in the months ahead."

Mr. Speakes said the fact that the February rise was smaller than January's also indicated that the economy was not overheating, as some economists had begun to fear. If economic growth surges ahead too quickly, it could reignite inflation.

Jerry Jasinowski, chief economist for the National Association of Manufacturers, said the index of leading indicators and other optimistic reports had prompted him to revise his forecast of economic activity upward to 5.5 percent growth in the second quarter after inflation and 3 percent in the second half of the year.

"There is nothing in the picture that shows major economic difficulties for the rest of the year," Mr. Jasinowski said.

Optimistic Forecast

Robert Wescott of Wharton Econometrics, a private forecasting firm, was even more optimistic, predicting 5.4 percent growth in the second quarter, followed by 4.9 percent in the third and 3.2 percent in the fourth.

"When you get as broad-based a recovery as we have now, the economy just doesn't stop from one quarter to the next," he said. * * *

A while ago we heard about the criticism of this Argentine bailout. In that respect I would like to offer for the RECORD at this point a Washington Post article of today on page A23, by Hobart Rowen, who is the economic writer and financial writer for the Post.

And it is entitled "Argentina Plays Chicken—And Wins a Round."

The significant part is in the third paragraph of this article. It says:

The key fact is that for the first time the American Government has made itself the guarantor of $300 million in loans to Argentina by the four Latin American countries—Mexico, Venezuela, Colombia, and Brazil.

The Washington Post article follows:

ARGENTINA PLAYS CHICKEN—AND WINS A ROUND

(By Hobart Rowen)

There is much more than meets the eye in the remarkable $500 million rescue package engineered on behalf of Argentina last weekend by four other Latin American countries (themselves heavily in debt), 11 international banks and the United States.

To sum it up, in a dangerous international game of "chicken" with the big banks, Argentina won the first round.

The key fact is that for the first time, the American government has made itself the guarantor of $300 million in loans to Argentina by the four Latin American countries—Mexico, Venezuela, Colombia and Brazil.

This could well be a major turning point in the world debt crisis—governmental intervention to begin a long-range restructuring of the debt, making it possible for poor countries to pay off their huge debts without their being pushed to the wall.

The Alfonsin government in Argentina, trying to move toward democratic institutions, had decided that it would not bleed its monetary reserves to pay the interest owed foreigners on its $43 billion debt.

If the choice was to be between riots and trying to meet the interest payments due at New York, Chicago and European banks—well, the Alfonsin government decided, it would risk getting a poor credit rating rather then a upheaval at home. There was every prospect that a critical deadline would pass and that the banks would have to label some Argentine loans as "non-performing."

The question would then be: which country would line up next as an unwilling debtor? But as economist William R. Cline says, a "deus ex machina was designed to resolve the impasse [and it] was a true work of art."

By joining together with Argentina, the other Latin American countries effectively created a "debtors' club" that said, in effect: "We are not refusing to pay our debts, but we must get better terms." The Americans agreed to repay the four Latin American countries (which are hardly in position to be bankrolling others) once Argentina signs a deal with the International Monetary Fund. And the United States will be repaid when Argentina gets its money from the IMF.

By holding out until the last moment, threatening the banks with the embarrassing admission to their stockholders that they had made some awfully bad loans, Argentina got a bailout package at a lower rate of interest. It almost certainly will get help from the IMF with less austere terms than otherwise might have been demanded.

There are many who can share credit for solving, at least temporarily, what could have been an ugly crisis. Mexican Finance Minister Jesus Silva Herzog was the key mastermind who brought his country and the other three into the deal.

And at long last, after trying to sidestep the issue, the Treasury Department was convinced by America's friends in Latin America that preserving the stability of that key region is at least as important to this country as our military/political interventions in Central America. Deputy Treasury Secretary Tim McNamar thus played a critical role in negotiating with the Alfonsin government in Buenos Aires.

"What you now have," says Goldman Sachs & Co. vice president Robert Hormats, just back from Argentina, "is a group of debtor nations that can say to the banks: Look, we have behaved responsibly and constructively. We will continue to do so, but we need better terms.' "

The kind of austerity that has been enforced on them has reduced their imports and their standard of living and, incidentally, has cut dramatically into exports from the United States, costing an estimated 300,000 jobs here. In addition, protectionist devices help shut off exports from the debtor nations, effectively closing off their main source of earnings that could enable them to service the debt.

Until this past weekend, the United States has favored a policy of "muddling through" the debt crisis: rescheduling the debt at ever-higher interest rates, on the theory that with a modest global economic recovery, all of the players—lenders and borrowers—would survive.

But now the promise of the new rescue package is that the United States has finally admitted that something beyond "muddling through" is needed. To be sure, as New York banker Felix Rohatyn told me, "If the new package turns out to be merely another in a long line of temporary Band-Aids, nothing much will have been accomplished."

But Rohatyn, like Hormats, agrees there is reason for cautious optimism, for one thing, having given Argentina a very low rate of interest, a new and more reasonable standard seems to have been set for other countries. Second, having taken itself into the picture by guaranteeing another country's balance-of-payments loan, the United States has made a commitment not easy to chuck overboard.

Each one of these countries has an equal or worse fiscal and monetary situation and debt than Argentina. As a matter of fact, Argentina compared to Brazil and Mexico is a piker. And they, we got together by saying, you front for us but we are going to guarantee.

This is an exact repetition of what we did after World War I that I have been talking about for months, for years, when I saw the pattern clearly years ago, as long ago as before the 22 years ago that I came to this Congress. Then in that time the war reparations or the like ended up in being foistered on the American taxpayer who had extended the credit to begin with that made it possible to have the war reparations, war debts and especially from our so-called allies England and France. The taxpayer ended up in picking up the tab for the United States for the same reasons that the Secretary of the Treasury gave the other day for bailing out Argentina. The same identical reasons.

All we have to do is just transpose the dateline and the names of the countries, and you have exactly what happened after World War I. So that when the bubble busts, when the house of cards collapsed, as this one is, all these indicia have been the same.

All I am arguing and have been arguing—because I think the Congress has the inescapable responsibility of what I guess in the Old Testament has been called the sacrament of decision, going back to the beautiful descriptive chapter on Elijah the Prophet, who, confronted by the Israel faithful suddenly bowing before the false god Baal, said, "You've got to make a choice. Who do you really worship as your true God?"

And this is exactly the sacrament of decision we in the Congress as Representatives of the American people must make sooner or later. Are we for our people or are we for these tremendous vested oligarchic interests who now control the decision and the power and determine war and peace, as we are today in Latin America, above all?

Yes; I ask my colleagues to say now—I do not know, at this point, even if we rose in arms, that we could compel the decision to change the course definitely. It is too late. But there is no excuse for us not anticipating and, therefore, in anticipating, taking action now as anticipatory action to reduce and attenuate the suffering that unquestionably will grow exponentially compared to what we think we are suffering now. As bad as it is, as obfuscated as it is by our news disseminating media, tragically, we do have that task. And all I am saying is, yes, there are things that can and should be done now in anticipation, and not the least of which for Congress to rise to its constitutional obligation.

The idea that such things, for instance, as the present suffering and flagellating under the tyranny and the robbery and the thievery of high interest rates, usurious rates. Eleven percent, they do not even talk about that now, but that is usurious and always was considered.

But we are talking now about just a plain little businessman, and I mean a little businessman, that I define as the one who cannot afford to have a lobbyist in Washington. That is a real small businessman. If he wants to go out, as I said ad nauseam, right now and borrow anywhere in the country from the institutions that his Government charters for the purpose of being available for public need and convenience, not for profit, that is, speculative, not for aggrandizement in an orgiastic way such as we see now where the resources of credit are tied up by the giants struggling to eat each other up, not producing one job, not producing one product, and, in the process, selling out to the false god of greedy gain the American people and their well being, all with the witting or unwitting connivance of the representatives of the people.

The idea that interest rates are an act of God is something these very same forces have propelled and the Congress has supinely accepted, not realizing that the Congress created such entities as the so-called Federal Reserve Board, which is not Federal, it is not a Federal agency. It is a private institution, and it is completely in its own orbit, out of control. It does not account to the Congress, it does not account to the President, and yet it is the engine, the mechanism that is restructuring, and certainly not for the gain of the greatest interest of the greatest number of this country, restructuring what we call the American way, the American standard of living, where we are now, back to where the colonists, who fought a revolution because of it, died to prevent, and that is a reestablishment of the mercantile system, where we are the market, the consumer for these other entities that have been able. How? By themselves never forgetting what their own national interests were and not turning their backs on that. Just like after World War I. The same thing.

Why, we talked about this bailout and how we the taxpayers now will be paying for the bad loans made by these huge oligarchic backing institutions, not less than six, not more than nine of them, who actually are the ones who operate and dictate the policy of the Federal Reserve Board.

I do not see an outcry anywhere about that. On the contrary, I see defense, I see some of my colleagues saying, "Oh, we can't tamper with the independence of the Federal Reserve Board." And some people say, "Well, do you want the politicians"—meaning us—"to determine what is priority? Why, horrors, that would be wrong."

Well, that is what our Government is all about. The first words of the Constitution, "We the people of the United States"—it does not say, "We the Congress," or "I the President," although a lot of Americans think that is the way it ought to be now.

In fact, I am disappointed, because I receive some calls after some of these talks and some letters from people who say, "Oh, you know, you are right, you are saying things that we just did not think we were going to hear from a congressional level. Gee, I wish you were President."

That is disappointing to me. In the first place, I am not the least bit interested in that office. I do not envy that office. I would not even offer it to my worst enemy. But the thing that troubles me is that here are Americans now, looking upon some exalted individual or office for salvation. Why, that is not what I would seek. If I were President I could not singlehandedly, if we maintain our system, do anything about it.

What I am trying to do is to say that we, the Representatives of the people, and the national policymaking body of this Government, in concert through majority vote, not one vote, are the only ones who will be able to lead us out. And if we fail there, then, so be it. But the idea and the notion now is so set in the popular mind that salvation is going to come from the Office of the Presidency, like a king, or somebody like that. That is a shame, because it is so wrong a concept of what we are all about in America.

The fact remains that we have our work cut out for us, and we should know that. I do not think that any of my colleagues can deny or gainsay me when I say that it is impossible for any little businessman at this point to go out and get even $1,500 commercial loan to, say, get a little inventory for his floor without having to pay over 17½ percent interest. I do not know of anybody who can tell me that.

So am I right? Am I wrong? If I am right, is that right? Should we allow it? Should we not rise as one and protest and demand that something be done abut it? It can be. Interest rates are not an act of God, I repeat.

What about the other? What about the fact that the majority here and in the other body voted for $8.3 billion just this last year in the waning hours of the first session of this 98th Congress. For what? For this very purpose that $300 million of the swap funds were so dedicated for the guarantee. Of what? Repayment of principal? No. Just carrying over part payment of the interest rate. They do not even talk about the principal. So do you have to be a financial genius to know that that whole damn thing is going to collapse, that it is going to crumble? Of course you do not have to be a genius.

Does it not mean that we should ask to what purpose must we once again be what they called us between World War I and World War II in Europe: Not Uncle Sam; Uncle Sap. Then when some of our leaders spoke like the young man did earlier about, hey, wait awhile, what is this business? How can paying debt with more debt be a solution to anything.

We had voices like that in 1929 and 1930 here in the House and over in the Senate. Look at the RECORD, you will see the speeches, Oh, sure, they were lonely voices, and that is true, but, history records that they were on record. And they said it. Nobody heeded, because in the euphoria of such sayings as credit inflation, which is what we have had, we have had these high rollers.

All of a sudden we had an upsurge in the total number of millionaires we are producing. Somebody wrote about a month ago in some magazine that by 1990 we would have about somewhere around a million, million, million, million millionaires; megamillionaires. But that is an assumption that a lot of people made also as I said and repeat, just 6 months before October 1929. It is predicated on the fact that this pyramid scheme, because that is what it is, is going to last forever, and of course, it never has and never will and it cannot.

I say again that there are things that can be done, some of the specifics some of us have advocated. They are too lengthy for presentation at this time and under these circumstances. But I would say that the hour of the sacrament of decision is upon us. I would also say it is true that the worst of slaves are corrupted free men. If we have become so corrupted, then you cannot impose freedom on people unwilling to be free, and corrupted freemen are the worst of slaves.

LEGISLATION FOR THE PROTECTION OF SPORTS FANS AND CITIES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California (Mr. STARK) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation that breathes new life into the battle to bring the Oakland Raiders back to Oakland. Also, the legislation gives hope to the Baltimore Colts fans who were recently deprived of their team. But more than that, this bill will protect sports fans across the country from the possible loss of their favorite team.

Though most sports teams are owned by private investers and operate in a for-profit manner, the teams receive significant subsidies from the taxpayers. Local stadium authorities underwrite the capital costs of a stadium by floating bond issues. The interest on these bonds is generally exempt from Federal income taxes.

Additionally, other types of tax concessions have been made to team owners by various governmental authorities. Prince George's County near Washington, D.C., gave the Washington Capital's hockey team special tax consideration. Indianapolis offered the Colts a multimillion-dollar loan at a significantly reduced interest rate, subsidized by the taxpayers. The public at both local and national levels have made direct monetary investments in sports leagues.

This legislation would allow cities and taxpayers to protect their investment of tax dollars by allowing a stadium authority the right of first refusal. If an owner decides that he wants to move a team or an offer is made for the team that would result in the team's relocation, the stadium authority would have the opportunity to find a buyer that would keep the team at the stadium. Moreover, the legislation protects cities and fans that have been loyal to the team by providing a set of conditions that would have to be met before a team could leave.

Mr. Speaker, other methods have been tried to resolve what has become an increasingly volatile situation in the National Football League and has the potential to become volatile in other sports leagues. Teams are hopping from city to city at an increasing rate. So far, no progress has been made in correcting this situation. The reputations of some of the greatest cities in the land are threatened. Thousands of fans are left with their loyalty dangling and their tax dollars spent in vain.

I think this legislation provides a new opportunity for the Congress to resolve the serious problem of sports franchise relocation.●

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

Mr. HAWKINS, from the Committee on House Administration, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the House of the following title, which was thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H.R. 4072. An act to make adjustments in the commodity programs for wheat, feedgrains, upland cotton, and rice, to provide agricultural credit assistance, and for other purposes.

SENATE ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

The SPEAKER announced his signature to an enrolled bill of the Senate of the following title:

S. 2392. An act to authorize the President to appoint Donald D. Engen to the Office of Administrator of the Federal Aviation Administration.

BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. HAWKINS, from the Committee on House Administration, reported that that committee did on this day present to the President, for his approval, a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 4072. An act to make adjustments in the commodity programs for wheat feedgrains, upland cotton, and rice, to provide agricultural credit assistance, and for other purposes.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY, APRIL 9, 1984

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 54 minutes p.m.) under its previous order, the House adjourned until Monday, April 9, 1984, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

3094. A letter from the Deputy Secretary of Defense, transmitting certification with respect to the inertial upper stage (IUS) program, based on cost estimates provided in the December 31, 1983 selected acquisition report of the Department, pursuant to 10 U.S.C. 139b; to the Committee on Armed Services.

3095. A letter from the Auditor, District of Columbia, transmitting a report entitled, "Compliance Audit of the District of Columbia Lottery and Charitable Games Control Board," pursuant to Public Law 93-198, section 455(d); to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

3096. A letter from the Secretary of Education, transmitting a copy of proposed "Final Regulations for Bilingual Education: State Educational Agency Projects for Technical Assistance," pursuant to GEPA, section 431(d)(1) (88 Stat. 567; 90 Stat. 2231; 95 Stat. 453); to the Committee on Education and Labor.

3097. A letter from the Assistant Secretary for Administration, Department of Housing and Urban Development, transmitting notice of a proposed new Federal records system, pursuant to 5 U.S.C. 552a(o); to the Committee on Government Operations.

3098. A letter from the General Counsel, Office of Personnel Management, transmitting a copy of a recent decision of the U.S. District Court in the District of Columbia concerning the public disclosure of the amount of gross annuities payable to retired Members of Congress; to the Committee on Government Operations.

3099. A letter from the Administrator, National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, Department of Commerce, transmitting the fiscal year 1983 report on NOAA's activities and progress in implementing the Ocean Thermal Energy Conversion Act of 1980, pursuant to Public Law 96-320, sections 405 and 117; to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

3100. A letter from the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation entitled the "Veterans' Readjustment Act of 1984," pursuant to 31 U.S.C. 1110; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

3101. A letter from the Board of Trustees, Federal Hospital Insurance Trust Fund, transmitting the 1984 annual report of the Board, pursuant to SSA, section 1817(b)(2) (H. Doc. No. 98-199); to the Committee on Ways and Means and ordered to be printed.

3102. A letter from the Board of Trustees, Federal Old-Age and Survivors Insurance and Disability Insurance Trust Funds, transmitting the 1984 annual report of the Board, Pursuant to SSA, section 201(c)(2) (H. Doc. No. 98-200); to the Committee on Ways and Means and ordered to be printed.

3103. A letter from the Board of Trustees, Federal Supplementary Medical Insurance Trust Fund, transmitting the 1984 annual report of the Board, pursuant to SSA, section 1841(b)(2) (H. Doc. No. 98-198); jointly to the Committees on Ways and Means and Energy and Commerce and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

SENATE—Thursday, April 5, 1984

(Legislative day of Monday, March 26, 1984)

The Senate met at 10 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the Honorable GORDON J. HUMPHREY, a Senator from the State of New Hampshire.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Our prayer this morning will be offered by the Reverend James W. Chapman, minister, the Bath church, United Church of Christ, in Bath, Ohio.

Prior to his present ministry, he served 23 years as an Air Force chaplain. Reverend Chapman is sponsored by Senator MARK HATFIELD.

PRAYER

The Reverend James W. Chapman, minister, the Bath church, United Church of Christ, Bath, Ohio, offered the following prayer:

Will you join me in a word of prayer?

Eternal God, Creator and Sustainer of each person and each nation, we bow to acknowledge Your sovereignty over us as a people. We know that whatever we do that is not within Your will is futile and counterproductive. We know as well that that which is Your will for us abounds beyond our wildest hopes.

Your revelation of Yourself to us has been enough that we know quite well what You would have us do. We understand the goals that you have set before us. We have articulated them in majestic terms in our national documents. So we do not so much pray for wisdom and understanding as we do for courage to do that which we already comprehend.

Having received Your directions for our lives, let us have the humility to put aside selfish goals in preference for those unselfish ones which best serve Your kingdom. If we can do that, then we shall be known not for personal achievement, but for the shared good of all our people, and through them, the well-being of the wide world around us. In the name of Jesus Christ I pray. Amen.

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will please read a communication to the Senate from the President pro tempore (Mr. THURMOND).

The assistant legislative clerk read the following letter:

U.S. SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, D.C., April 5, 1984.

To the Senate:

Under the provisions of rule I, section 3, of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby appoint the Honorable GORDON J. HUMPHREY, a Senator from the State of New Hampshire, to perform the duties of the Chair.

STROM THURMOND,
President pro tempore.

Mr. HUMPHREY thereupon assumed the chair as Acting President pro tempore.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the standing order, the majority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair.

COMMENDATION OF THE VISITING CHAPLAIN

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, first I wish to commend our distinguished visiting chaplain today. We are delighted to have him with us in our presence. He is another in a long line of distinguished ministers who have served as our visiting chaplain, and he adds to the distinction of that group.

I also wish to thank Senator HATFIELD for inviting him to perform this function today.

May I say parenthetically that his loud resonant voice must surely have been heard by all in this room, and no doubt commands the attention of those who are not in the Chamber at this moment.

SENATE SCHEDULE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, after the two leaders are recognized under the standing order, there will be a period for the transaction of routine morning business until 10:30 a.m., at which time the Senate will resume consideration of the supplemental appropriations bill which is the unfinished business.

I anticipate that the Levin amendment will be offered shortly after we convene. I understand that a reduced time has been agreed to by the managers and Senator LEVIN to provide for 40 minutes equally divided. I am not sure that has been formalized, but it was my understanding last evening that it had been agreed to.

After that, Mr. President, I anticipate that my colleague from Tennessee, Senator SASSER, will offer an amendment dealing with Honduras. It is hoped that the 4 hours allotted for that amendment can be substantially reduced. I conversed with Senator SASSER last evening about that, and I am encouraged to think that we may be able to negotiate a shorter time limitation. That has not been done yet.

There are other amendments, Mr. President, that may be offered. But in any event, it is the hope of the leadership on this side that we can finish the supplemental appropriations bill today. The Senate is on notice of, and should be prepared for, a late session today, if necessary, in order to accomplish that purpose.

In addition, Mr. President, as I have advised the minority leader previously, it is the hope of the leadership on this side that we could then proceed to the small reconciliation bill, so-called. I will discuss that further with the minority leader in the course of the morning, but I would reiterate that hope.

Mr. President, as I see it now, the Senate will be in session tomorrow and perhaps on Saturday, as I indicated earlier this week. But if we can finish the supplemental, and if we can finish the small reconciliation bill, there is a possibility at least that we could avoid the Saturday session, and perhaps even a part of the Friday session. But once more, I will discuss that with the managers and most especially with the minority leader.

SPECIAL ORDER REQUESTS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I believe the only other announcement that I should make at this time is this: There are a number of Senators who had requested special orders for this morning. Since we did not recess until late last night, I asked those Senators—I believe there are eight of them—to postpone their requests for special orders.

We will try to accommodate those requests later today or, if not today, then tomorrow. I offer my apologies to those Senators for not providing special order time this morning. But I think they surely do understand that after a late evening, with the 10 o'clock convening hour this morning, and the necessity to try to finish the supplemental appropriations bill that it would have delayed beginning consideration of that bill very substantially.

So I express my appreciation for the willingness to forego special orders this morning. I assure the Senators that I will make provision for that either later today or tomorrow.

Mr. President, I do not think I have any further need for my time under the standing order. I see no other Senators seeking recognition. I offer my remaining time to the minority leader.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished majority leader.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the standing order the minority leader is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

May I ask whether my friend from Wisconsin, Mr. PROXMIRE, will need additional time?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I would appreciate it; if I could have 4 or 5 minutes, it would be very helpful.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes of my time to the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. PROXMIRE) and I yield the remaining minutes back to the distinguished majority leader in the event that he would have some use for the time.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator.

Before the Senator from Wisconsin begins, may I say that the Senator from California (Mr. WILSON) was one of the eight Senators who had requested special order time. He now tells me that he needs about 2 minutes. So after the Senator from Wisconsin speaks, I propose to yield 2 minutes of the time remaining under the standing order to the Senator from California.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin is recognized.

DO THE NUCLEAR SUPERPOWERS—THE UNITED STATES AND THE SOVIET UNION—HAVE MUTUAL INTERESTS?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the United States and the Soviet Union have a single overwhelmingly important mutual interest—the prevention of nuclear war. A nuclear war between the superpowers would destroy both countries utterly. So what are these two nuclear giants doing together to prevent that final and absolute catastrophe? Both are relying on the old conventional war thesis that in a world of infinite military power only more and more power can provide genuine security, safety, and peace. How ironic! From what source comes the greatest threat to human life? Answer: From the appalling and growing power of nuclear arms.

So on what do both sides—both nuclear superpowers—place their reliance for peace in this nuclear world? Answer: More nuclear arms. Of course, there is a simple, primitive, and very partial wisdom in this mutual nuclear buildup. Both sides are, indeed, building and refining and increasing an evermore awesome nuclear deterrent. Leaders on both sides have expressed increasing understanding of the utter insanity of nuclear war. Both know that a superpower nuclear war would have destroyed both sides 25 years ago. They know that destruction would have been ever more complete 10 years ago. They know it would be totally devastating today. They also know that as the years roll on into the future the force of that destructive nuclear power marches ever closer to the extermination of the human species. The realization of the absolute and total destructiveness of nuclear war today has become at the moment the single most compelling contribution to peace. So why is this not enough? Mr. President, if we coud find a way of stopping the nuclear arms race on this very day, freezing it, then we could count on this nuclear deterrence to provide some basis for continuing nuclear peace. But we are nowhere near such an agreement.

In fact, at this moment arms control talks between the United States and the Soviet Union have stopped. Our President has not talked directly in person about anything with the Soviet leader for more than 3 years. There is no indication that arms control talks will resume any time soon. And suppose they do resume—would they give any promise of stopping the arms race? Certainly not on the course they were moving when they were suspended. Why not? Because they did not touch the nuclear arms technological race. There were no negotiations under way to stop testing.

SALT/START negotiations did limit the number of new missiles that could be flight tested, but even if both powers reached full agreement on all the issues on the table in the START and IMF talks, the technological race speeds on, leaving deterrence unfortunately in the dust.

The nuclear arms technology developments threaten to bring on nuclear weapons in the next 10 or 15 years which will enable one side or the other to believe that it has the capacity to literally win a nuclear war. As Leslie Gelb, the New York Times nuclear expert, wrote recently the nuclear deterrence that has kept the peace for the past 35 years may vanish, anquished by nuclear arms technology progress.

And less than 16 years from now—by the year 2000 some 31 nations will—according to estimates by our military experts—have nuclear arsenals, unless two things happen. First, we must stop the nuclear arms technology race that is moving toward precisely the kind of weapons that smaller nations can afford: small, portable, and still infinitely lethal. Second, we must get serious about stopping nuclear proliferation. If the United States and the Soviet Union cooperate to use our joint economic power we have the ability to stop this spread of nuclear weapons beyond the six or eight nations that presently have nuclear capability.

So, again what mutual interests do the United States and the Soviet Union have? As I said at the beginning of this speech the dominating mutual interest is to prevent nuclear war. And that means that both nations have a deep interest in stopping the arms race. Of course, that will require the resumption of the broken-off arms control talks. It will require that the talks expand greatly to include a mutual and verifiable freeze on the testing, manufacture, and deployment of all nuclear arms. And it will mean that the negotiators agree to put their full resources into stopping nuclear proliferation using the economic power of both countries in a full court press to stop any export that would enable even one additional country to develop a nuclear arsenal.

Mr. President, while the U.S. Expeditionary Force did engage in hostilities in 1918 with Russia, as President Reagan recently pointed out our country has never been engaged in a major war with the Soviet Union.

We forgot as the Common Cause Guide Understanding Nuclear Weapons Policy points out that there are 75 United States-Soviet bilateral agreements at present on environmental cooperation, health, housing, agriculture and energy, maritime affairs, trade, commerce, and aviation. In addition over 500 U.S. corporations have signed agreements with the Soviet Union for commodity sales and scientific and technological exchanges of nonstrategic goods. We now have a thriving grain trade with the Soviet Union. So we have something to build our agreements on. Will the Soviets keep such agreements? Yes; for two reasons. First, they have as strong an interest in preventing nuclear war as we do. Neither of us has a death wish. Both of us want to survive. Second, we can craft agreements, as I established in my speech on the floor of the Senate when I last spoke on this issue, that we can effectively verify.

THE BAFFLING LACK OF SENATE ACTION FOR THE GENOCIDE CONVENTION

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I stand before you today, as I have nearly every day that Congress has been in session since 1967, to urge the Senate to support the Genocide Convention.

There has been no human rights treaty that has been subject to more detailed scrutiny than the Genocide Convention. Every line, every word, and every syllable has been studied and reviewed and debated.

Over the years, the legitimate questions raised regarding this convention have been carefully and conclusively refuted.

Since 1948, approximately 86 nations have become parties to the Genocide Convention. The United States actively participated in drafting the terms of the convention and in securing its adoption by the General Assembly. And yet, we still abstain from becoming a party to this most important treaty.

Here is a treaty that has the complete support of a long line of Presidents, both Democratic and Republican alike, and has the endorsement of every branch of the Armed Forces. The list of supporters goes on and on, but the Senate has yet to act.

Its purpose is quite clear. The Genocide Convention attempts to safeguard under international law the most fundamental human principles—the right to live.

What could be more basic? What could be more consistent with fundamental American principles?

Mr. President, the long delay in Senate action must be baffling to our allies and a delight to those who wish us ill in the world. It is time that we eliminate this confusion. It is time that once again America resume its leadership in the forefront of the human rights movement.

Through ratification of the Genocide Convention we will lend our support to the most fundamental of human rights—the right of all national, ethnic, racial, and religious groups to live. But ratification will convey an even stronger message: It will demonstrate that America is determined to back its words with actions and will strengthen our hand in protesting the numerous violations of human rights that continue to plague our world.

The Genocide Convention will not be a panacea for the human rights violations of the world but an important step in the right direction.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to join me in seeking ratification this year.

Mr. President, I thank the minority leader for having yielded.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California.

FAT CATS AND DEMOCRATS

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, the press of business in the Senate these last few days has been such that very probably a number of my colleagues may have missed the opportunity to read and digest a leading editorial that appeared in yesterday's Wall Street Journal. It is an editorial entitled "Fat Cats and Democrats," and takes note that two big events recently occurred in Latin America. The first was the U.S. Treasury decision to back a $300 million bridge loan to Argentina so that that nation may make its interest payments to Western banks.

The second was the Presidential election in El Salvador.

As the editorial states, the juxtaposition of these events gives Americans and the United States an opportunity to think about the ways people in the rest of the world may think of us as America the fat cat and America the democrat.

The editorial goes on to state that:

> But if you were a citizen of Central or South America reading news accounts of the Argentine loan and the Salvadoran elections, we suspect your view of the North Americans, as they call us, would be that we're reliable fat cats but only fair weather democrats.

Mr. President, I commend this editorial, not just to those in the Senate but perhaps even more so to our colleagues in the House.

The editorial notes the sad fact that there has not been a full vote of the Congress, in fact, it says:

> Surprisingly, the full Senate and House have not voted on Salvadoran aid since fall of 1981.

It goes on to note that, by default, expression of congressional policy has been made by speeches of individual Senators, but by no concrete floor action which would express the view of this body or the House of Representatives.

It then scolds us, quite properly, and says, "The full Congress should not allow this state of affairs to persist."

Mr. President, I quite agree. I think we have had a useful debate here in this body for the past week or so. There have been a number of votes, some on words and some on money. But finally, at least, this body has acted with respect to specific measures that relate to our aid to democracy as it is burgeoning in El Salvador.

I hope that the House will take to heart the admonition given by the Journal in an editorial that deserves our attention. I hope that they will act as this body has, after full debate but will act, because I think it is deplorable that we have not seen a vote since the fall of 1981.

Mr. President, the time for debate has passed. The time for action is now, if we are not to be seen as second-class democrats, as those who speak volumes about democracy but take our own for granted and will not provide sufficient protection for those who are struggling valiantly to secure their own.

It is time for the Congress of the United States, indeed, to act fully, to act promptly, and dispel the image that is so clearly outlined in this editorial.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FAT CATS AND DEMOCRATS

We have had two big events recently in the ongoing melodrama called Latin America. The first was the U.S. Treasury's decision to back a $300 million bridge loan to Argentina so it could make its interest payments to Western banks. The second was the presidential election in El Salvador. The juxtaposition of these events gives Americans in the U.S. an opportunity to think about the ways people in the rest of the world may look at us—as America the fat cat and America the democrat.

Despite all the U.S.'s extraordinary economic success, most Americans here would probably give rein to their native idealism and prefer that the rest of the world look to the U.S. mainly as a model of the possibilities of the democratic tradition. But if you were a citizen of Central or South America reading news accounts of the Argentine loan and the Salvadoran elections, we suspect your view of the North Americans, as they call us, would be that we're reliable fat cats but only fair-weather democrats.

The Argentine loan crisis, like its predecessors, made it clear that if you're sitting in Buenos Aires, the only serious thing you have to keep in mind about America the fat cat is that it's the one country in the world that can and will pump $300 million out of something called the Export Stabilization Fund. The United States, as a superpower, is supposed to stand for something significant, but the Argentine loan deal, so seemingly protective of a handful of banks' first-quarter earnings, makes the U.S. look mainly like something resembling the Dutch East India Company.

But we are a big nation with many interests, and the El Salvador election ought to have been an opportunity to put our best foot forward. To date, that is an opportunity that has been taken poorly or halfheartedly.

Last week 1.3 million of a possible 2.5 million Slavadorans voted. One major piece of U.S. newspaper analysis of the election carried this headline: "Salvador Vote Settles Little at Home or in Washington." Sen. Chris Dodd said of the Salvadoran election: "The centers of power in El Salvador will remain the same the day after the election as the day before." Mr. Dodd favors negotiating some sort of settlement with El Salvador's antidemocratic guerrillas. Before the election, a Washington Post editorial suggested "intrusive policies may have to be followed to ensure the victory, and then the seating, of Christian Democrat Napoleon Duarte." Meanwhile, Gary Hart and Walter Mondale compete to see who would jerk U.S. troops out of Central America faster. Mr. Hart argues that our military presence will push us into "another unwinnable war," which isn't quite accurate. When we pull out, a freshly resupplied communist insurgency will roll up El Salvador and its voters like an old carpet.

Then we have both the speaker of the House and a Democratic senator from Tennessee demanding to know whether the War Powers Act is violated if U.S. planes stationed in Honduras signal the Salvadoran army the whereabouts of its enemy, or if U.S. military advisers find themselves directly in the guerrillas' line of fire.

This Monday, however, the U.S. Senate defeated by a lopsided margin (63-25) attempts to drastically cut a $61.7 million emergency aid package for El Salvador. How is one to square this support for El Salvador with the unrelenting criticism the place seems to get from Congress? Well, surprisingly the full Senate and House have not voted on Salvadoran aid since fall 1981. By default, the entire Central American debate has been framed by publicity given the authorizing subcommittees of Senate Foreign Relations and House Foreign Affairs, whose legislative proposals have been so extreme the leadership won't bring them to a floor vote. But the members and staffs of these subcommittees are creating the impression that this country regards democratic elections as just another policy blip, no more or less important than aid conditionality or the subsections of a War Powers Act no three people agree on.

The full Congress should not allow this state of affairs to persist. Good-faith efforts to restore the democratic process in places such as El Salvador deserve united praise and support, not yawns and derision. The alternative is allowing ourselves to become known primarily for our skill at matters like Argentina's overdue interest. We become just the latest mercantile nation that at some point in history happened to have enough money to roll over other people's debts.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, how much time remains under the standing order?

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Two minutes thirty seconds.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin.

VOTING PRACTICES IN THE UNITED NATIONS—GRENADA

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, today I am giving my fourth speech on the voting practices of member countries in the United Nations.

As I indicated in my first statement on April 2, I am using as background for my speeches the first annual report that Congress mandated last year. This law, that I am proud to have authored, requires the Secretary of State and the Permanent Representative to the United Nations to report to Congress each year on voting practices in the world body.

The first annual Kasten report is now available through the Senate Appropriations Committee and is entitled "Foreign Assistance Appropriations, 1985—Part 3."

Americans for the first time ever can now review important votes in the United Nations and see how recipients of U.S. foreign aid voted on issues critical to U.S. foreign policy.

I am focusing this series of speeches concerning voting practices on a separate key issue or cluster of issues that came before the U.N. General Assembly or the Security Council last year.

Today I will review the U.N. General Assembly vote on the rescue of Grenada by the United States and the Organization of Eastern Caribbean States. This action of the OECS and of the United States in Grenada last October first was greeted with much partisan argument in this Congress. Very shortly after the initial shock of news of the action, however, bipartisan factfinding missions from the Congress were able to bring about remarkably strong consensus that the joint U.S. OECS action had been legally and morally justifiable.

Congressional factfinders who visited Grenada shortly after order had been restored on the island discovered that the American and Eastern Caribbean forces had truly been welcomed by the mass of Grenadians with open arms. Even most of those in Grenada who had supported the regime of the Marxist Maurice Bishop regarded the intervention as a rescue.

The people of Grenada were aware that the Prime Minister and most members of his Cabinet had been murdered in cold blood by thugs calling themselves revolutionaries. The people knew that these same thugs were also threatening to shoot anyone on sight caught violating a 24-hour-a-day curfew. Facing the same peril were more than 1,000 Americans in Grenada, mostly students.

The ranking minority member of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, Representative BILL BROOMFIELD, remarked after the completion of the bipartisan congressional factfinding mission: "I am absolutely convinced that had the United States not intervened, inaction would have been comparable to playing Russian roulette with the lives of more than 1,000 Americans on the island."

While the majority of Members of Congress from both parties drew their conclusions about the Grenada events after thoughtful examination of the facts, a wholly different judgment of the Grenada affair was made by majorities in the United Nations. A majority of U.N. Security Council members voted in favor of a draft resolution condemning the action as a "flagrant violation of international law." The resolution was vetoed by the United States.

After that, the General Assembly, where no one member has veto power, seized the issue as a matter of emergency. In its rush to judgment, the General Assembly approved a resolution in which it adopted the language of the Draft Security Council resolution. One hundred and eight U.N. members voted for that General Assembly resolution. Only nine, including the United States, the nations of the organization of Eastern Caribbean States, El Salvador and Israel voted against it. Twenty-seven countries abstained.

Before this lobsided vote, an even more outrageous event occurred. A gag rule was imposed to prevent the United States and its Eastern Caribbean partners from even presenting their case. This, mind you, occurred in the U.N. General Assembly, a forum where debate on other subjects, such as Israeli "aggression and denial of human rights," streams on endlessly.

A procedural motion to cut off debate was proposed by the totalitarian regime that calls itself Democratic Yemen. Also known as South Yemen, Democratic Yemen is unambiguously a colony of the Soviet Empire. The gag rule was approved, by a vote of 60 in favor, 54 opposed—including the United States and most of the democracies—and 24 abstaining.

Mr. President, the recent Kasten report on voting practices in the United Nations issued earlier this year by the State Department documents that none of our NATO partners joined us in opposing the General Assemby resolution that condemned the Joint U.S.-OECS rescue mission. Some abstained, including the United Kingdom, Canada, the Federal Republic of Germany, and Turkey. Our strategic allies, France, Italy, Greece, and Spain, on the other hand, voted in favor of the resolution.

So few U.N. members voted with us on the substantive resolution denouncing our action in Grenada that it goes without saying that most U.S. military allies and the vast majority of beneficiaries of U.S. economic assistance were among those failing to support our position.

The close vote on the gag rule motion provides better drawn lines. Our NATO allies were nearly unanimous in opposing the gag rule. From among them, only Greece voted to cut off debate, while Spain cast the only abstention. The Soviet Union and its captive nations in Eastern Europe formed a solid bloc for the gag rule. Most of the Latin American and Caribbean states, on the other hand, voted to keep debate open. Disturbing exceptions within that region, besides the predictable ballots of Cuba and Nicaragua, were Argentina, Brazil, Colombia, Mexico, and Panama.

In Africa, only a few very close friends of the United States voted to permit debate: The Ivory Coast, the Sudan, Liberia, Togo, Somalia. In the Middle East, Asia and the Pacific, democracies such as Australia and Japan were joined by western-oriented governments of the Association of South East Asian Nations and the South Pacific islands in favor of permitting debate. India and Sri Lanka, alone among the Asian democracies, joined the Communists and other nondemocratic regimes of the region in voting for the gag rule.

Mr. President, there is simply no evading the fact that in the treatment of Grenada, the United States found itself with serious problems in its relations not only with traditional foes, but also with most of our better friends in the United Nations. These are problems which, of course, extend beyond the United Nations and related to the nature of and cooperation with our allies. But the event also demonstrates how serious is the crisis of fidelity to the principles of the U.N. Charter among U.N. members.

One only need note that the U.N. condemned the U.S.-OECS action in Grenada in substantially more vigorous terms than it ever has used to condemn Soviet aggression in Afghanistan. Indeed, the term "aggression" was never used in the Afghanistan resolution, nor was the term "condemn," nor was the Soviet Union ever mentioned by name in any of the operative paragraphs of the resolution. In a subsequent speech, I will have more to say about the notion of "moral equivalence of the superpowers" which unfortunately has become all too prevalent.

The Professional Community of International Lawyers, Mr. President, for the most part has agreed that the U.S. action in Grenada was compatible with international law. Most legal experts concur with the commonsense of most Americans, that the use of American power was appropriate and reasonable under the unique combination of circumstances that had prevailed in Grenada.

The professional legal judgment is excellently expressed in an article in the January 1984 issue of "The American Journal of International Law," entitled "Grenada and the International Double Standard." The article's author is Prof. John Norton Moore of the University of Virginia, a member of the Journal's board of editors. Professor Moore argues on the basis of factual evidence and international law that the Grenada intervention was altogether legal. Moreover, he warns that "an international double standard is eroding the foundations of the international legal order."

The League of Nations failed, Mr. Moore writes, "In part because the international community timidly ignored the mounting aggressive threats to international order. A repeat of the league collapse—and the subsequent descent into international anarchy—is simply unthinkable in the thermonuclear world. To avoid the unthinkable, the international community must abandon the international double standard and rigorously apply the great principles of the United Nations Charter."

Professor Moore's words succinctly describe the crisis of the United Nations. Although the crisis is not limited to voting behavior, we may gain very illuminating information on the crisis from the State Department's analysis of key votes from last year's General Assembly. Tomorrow I shall speak on how the crisis of the United Nations is exemplified in votes on resolutions concerning illegal use of chemical weapons.

Mr. President, I will ask unanimous consent that a table showing those countries which voted against the U.S. position on these issues and are scheduled to receive U.S. foreign assistance in fiscal year 1985 be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks. It should be pointed out that the table does not include those countries which abstained, even though in some cases an abstention can be interpreted as a vote against our position. Those countries which voted against our position on both of the issues I talked about today appear with an asterisk next to their names. The table also shows the proposed U.S. bilateral foreign assistance for each country for fiscal year 1985, the current year levels of assistance and the historic levels of assistance from 1946 through the fiscal year 1985 proposal.

I ask unanimous consent that the table to which I referred be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, there is a period for the transaction of routine morning business ordered until 10:30 this morning. Senators are reminded that at 10:30, the Senate will resume consideration of the supplemental appropriations bill. I urge the managers of that bill to be here on the floor so we can get an early start. I anticipate that the Levin amendment will be the first amendment offered when we resume consideration of that measure.

Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, there will be a period now for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 10:30 a.m., with statements therein limited to 2 minutes each.

TRAVELERS INSURANCE: RECIPIENT OF SMALL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT AWARD

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, the Small Business Administration recently awarded the Travelers Companies, the insurance giant in Hartford, the first Small Business Development Award for Connecticut.

The award was established to recognize the role that large businesses play in supporting the growth of small companies. For years, the Travelers has been known in the small business community for the unique opportunities that it offers small firms. It operates an extensive support system for 10,000 small businesses—independent insurance agencies. The Travelers assists these companies through counseling, financing, investment, and training. Further, as the SBA stated in its announcement of the award, the Travelers was singled out because of its socially responsible investment program, its corporate giving effort, corporate purchasing policy (including a special minority purchasing program), and its real estate and venture capital investments.

Mr. President, as those who have known and worked with the Travelers realize, this company has always been socially concerned and involved in the development of small enterprises. I commend SBA for making this award and congratulate the Travelers Companies wholeheartedly for their work.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

(Later, the following occurred:)

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I yield such time as the distinguished Senator from West Virginia, who has an important announcement to make about an event that took place in this town 40 years ago, wishes up to 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia is recognized.

PROGRESS IN SYNFUELS

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I am grateful to the able assistant majority leader, the Senator from Alaska (Mr. STEVENS), for yielding to me for the purpose of calling the attention of my Senate colleagues, the Members of the Congress generally, and to the country as a whole.

On that historic date, President Franklin Roosevelt signed the first Synthetic Liquid Fuels Act into law. I introduced that bill, H.R. 3209, in the fall of 1943. It allowed our Government to provide incentives and encourage a new and necessary industry over the threshold. It mandated development of new technologies to produce methanol and other liquid fuels from coal, ethanol from agricultural wastes, and oil shale.

Mr. President, I speak with sadness. The progress which I dreamed would come from the use of synthetic fuels has not taken place. Of the modest sum of $52 million appropriated in the 1940's, $3 million was returned to the U.S. Treasury in the midfifties.

I speak of a bill signed 40 years ago, and of the shortsightedness of this country in failing to provide a synthetic liquid fuels program during the years that followed. And even today, with an oil glut, who knows what will happen in a year? We do know what happened when OPEC hit us in 1973 and 1979. We experienced firsthand the long line of cars, that either could not get to the gas pumps or were turned away because of lack of supply once they reached those pumps.

Mr. President, I am in earnest now as I discuss this failure to meet a challenge with a sound program brought into being by the Congress, which was permitted by the Congress to be terminated.

To emphasize the importance of synthetic fuels to the Nation, on November 6, 1943, I flew in a Fairchild 24 from Morgantown to Washington, D.C., on about 80 gallons of coal-derived fuel. That fuel was processed at a small laboratory outside of Pittsburgh. The flight was piloted by Arthur Hyde, a native of Moorefield, W. Va.

Last year on November 6, I circled the field at the Morgantown airport in a Fairchild 24 to symbolize the 175-mile flight made 40 years earlier. Unfortunately, it was again to highlight the need to create a domestic synfuels industry. We were able to secure only one-half gallon of coal derived fuel for the flight.

The first flight in 1943 followed hearings I chaired in the House Subcommittee on Coal in 1942. It led to the passage of the Synthetic Liquid Fuels Act in 1944. By 1947, a memorandum circulated within the Interior Department which foresaw 5 years later, a federally subsidized synthetic fuels industry able to produce 2 million barrels of oil a day.

President Truman in 1949 continued Roosevelt's initiative. During his term of office two producing synthetic fuel plants were constructed in Missouri which turned coal to an assortment of petroleum products. The New York Times reported we were—* * * on the threshold of a profound chemical revolution. The next ten years will see the rise of a massive new industry which will free us from dependence on foreign sources of oil.

Unfortunately, this never happened. Why? Because, in 1955 the decision was made to eliminate all Government involvement in coal gasification and other alternative energy projects. President Eisenhower ordered the program ended on the assumption if needed, private industry would anticipate and correctly respond to assure the Nation had adequate fuel supplies.

In 1978, President Carter urged and Congress passed the first body of law which could be viewed as a national energy policy. In 1980, the Energy Security Act was approved as a second phase of our national energy plan to develop a viable synthetic fuels industry. The new act provided authorization for a beginning phase of $20 billion, and a second phase allowing for $68 billion to be used to create a synthetic fuels industry. Thus, we had again created the potential to recapture the initiative provided initially on April 5, 1944. I am convinced if that administration had continued we would now be breaking ground for a number of plants to provide alternative fuels for the Nation. But we did not continue this innovating, exciting, and crucial energy course. We saw history repeat itself in negative fashion.

Today, the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC), has the capability to produce 35 million barrels of oil per day with essentially no capital investment. In 1983, OPEC production was less than 15 million barrels per day. U.S. production is approximately 10 million barrels daily of crude and natural gas liquids. OPEC has idle twice the U.S. capability to provide petroleum.

To produce 8.5 million barrels each day of crude and 1.5 million cubic feet of natural gas, the United States has 580,000 oil wells and over 200,000 gas wells. Approximately 80,000 new wells must be drilled annually to sustain this level of production. Saudi Arabia, in contrast, can produce 12 million barrels per day with 750 wells. The Saudis are producing less than 4 million barrels to assure the price of $29 to $30 per barrel. The difference associated with capital investment needed is conclusive in competitiveness. Alternate energy technologies requiring large capital investment, such as producing synthetic gasoline from coal, have no opportunity for widespread application under these conditions without Government support.

We must not retreat in our national commitment to synthetic fuels. The money spent on these efforts are sound investments in our future. They are, in fact, of equal importance and must interlock with our defense spending for national security purposes. If synfuel development had been permitted to reach its commercial potential in the fifties or renew itself in the eighties much of the international tension being experienced today in Lebanon, the Strait of Hormuz, and other areas in the Mideast would have been negated.

In 1977, 37 percent of our oil imports came from Persian Gulf countries. In 1983, approximately 7 percent came from those areas. Britain, Norway, and Mexico are now providing 32 percent of our requirements. Even though we have reduced our exposure in the Middle East, many of our allies have not. Therefore, under oil-sharing terms contained in international energy agreements we continue energy hostages of the OPEC nations if supplies are cut off.

We cannot expect progress in synfuels with adequate oil supplies, a market-oriented administration, and serious organization and management problems within the Synthetic Fuels Corporation. How can we expect progress if industry has lost its nerve, and the press remains silent except to break the news of one company after another pulling out of planned synthetic fuels projects?

Progress has been made by the passage of the Energy Security Act and the creation of the Synthetic Fuels Corporation. We hear much about dismantling the programs and organization in the press. Unlike the midfifties, there are many strong congressional advocates in the House and Senate. I believe this congressional concern will sustain synfuels development against those who see abolition of the Corporation (SFC) as a method for deficit reduction or acting as a supplemental appropriation for general energy research and development. Continued synfuel development will also create natural and distinct, long-term and profitable markets for all grades, types, and qualities of coal. This, in turn, would blunt concern and division on environmental questions such as acid rain and percent reduction.

We must immediately encourage President Reagan to appoint qualified citizens to the three vacancies which now exist on the Synthetic Fuels Corporation Board of Directors. Then, if industry cannot be convinced to place their capital behind projects, perhaps we should give the Department of Defense access to Corporation funds. We can use the Government-owned, company-operated provisions already contained in the act. A recent report by the National Research Council, done for the Air Force, states without qualification there is a need for a variety of synthetic mobility test fuels and the facilities to produce those products. The study emphasizes the short-term need of synthetic fuels for military requirements and longer term use for bulk synthetic fuels in the commercial aviation industry.

Mr. President, given these facts we should not even consider whether synfuels will be produced and used but when they will begin to come on line. To assure progress continues we must advocate a rapid, action-based program using any one of three arguments.

First, synthetic fuels will be more economic in a long-range sense than are conventional fossil fuels. Because there is an element of risk, Government must provide an incentive to get the industry started.

Second, synthetic fuels are now uneconomic in a market sense, but they offer noneconomic benefits to the Government and general public, such as security of supply, foreign policy leverage, and reduction of the import penalty. Therefore, Government should provide a subsidy for as long as is necessary, not only to create but to sustain an industry.

Third, whether or not synthetic fuels are economic, our future energy demands will not match our conventional primary energy sources. Our Government should explore a number of full-scale synfuels projects to accurately appraise the economic, social, and environmental costs of the synfuels option. Such information will make for better governmental decisions in the future.

We must as a nation eliminate the irony that without oil shortages and soaring prices we systematically abandon synfuels programs designed specifically to protect against such a danger.

FEDERAL AID HIGHWAY ACT OF 1984

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that S. 2527, the Federal Aid Highway Act of 1984, and the section-by-section analysis be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2527

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1984".

INTERSTATE COST ESTIMATE APPROVAL

SEC. 102. The Secretary of Transportation shall apportion for the fiscal years ending September 30, 1985 and September 30, 1986 the remaining sums to be apportioned for such years under section 104(b)(5)(A) of title 23, United States Code, and shall adjust and reapportion for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1985 the apportionment made on March 9, 1984 under section 104(b)(5)(A) of title 23, United States Code, using the apportionment factors in the committee print numbered 98– of the Committee on Public Works and Transportation of the House of Representatives.

INTERSTATE SUBSTITUTE COST ESTIMATE APPROVAL

SEC. 103. The Secretary of Transportation shall apportion for the fiscal years ending September 30, 1984 and September 30, 1985, the remaining sums to be apportioned for such years under section 103(e)(4) of title 23, United States Code, and shall adjust and reapportion for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1984 the apportionment made on March 9, 1984 under section 103(e)(4) of title 23, United States Code, using the apportionment factors contained in the committee print numbered 98– of the Committee on Public Works and Transportation of the House of Representatives.

85 PERCENT MINIMUM ALLOCATION

SEC. 104. The Secretary of Transportation shall adjust and reallocate the allocation made on March 9, 1984 under section 157 of title 23, United States Code, to reflect the apportionment of Interstate funds for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1985 and the apportionment of Interstate highway substitute funds for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1984 made as a result of this Act.

RELEASE OF INTERSTATE CONSTRUCTION FUNDS

SEC. 105. Section 104(b)(5)(A) of title 23, United States Code, is amended by striking the five sentences that follow "January 2, 1983." and inserting in lieu thereof:

"Upon the approval by Congress, the Secretary shall use the Federal share of such approved estimates in making apportionments for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1985. The Secretary shall make revised estimates of the cost of completing the then designated Interstate System after taking into account all previous apportionments made under this section to the manner as stated above and transmit the same to the Senate and the House of Representatives within ten days subsequent to January 2, 1985 and January 2, 1987. In September of each year, the Secretary shall adjust the last estimate submitted to reflect (1) all previous apportionments and lapses of previous apportionments, (2) previous withdrawals of Interstate segments under section 103(e)(4) of this title, (3) previous allocations of Interstate discretionary funds under section 118(b)(2) of this title, and (4) Interstate transfers of funds under section 119(d) of this title. The Secretary shall use the Federal share of such adjusted and submitted estimates in making apportionments for the fiscal years ending September 30, 1986, September 30, 1987, September 30, 1988, September 30, 1989 and September 30, 1990.".

RELEASE OF INTERSTATE SUBSTITUTE FUNDS

SEC. 106. (a) The eighth sentence of section 103(e)(4) of title 23, United States Code, is amended by striking out the word "approved".

(b) Section 103(e)(4) of title 23, United States Code, is further amended by striking the sixteenth sentence and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "The Secretary shall make an estimate of the cost of completing substitute highway projects under this paragraph and transmit the same to the Senate and the House of Representatives within ten days subsequent to January 2, 1984. The Secretary shall adjust such cost estimate in September of 1984 and 1985 to reflect (1) changes in the amounts available to the Secretary under this paragraph, (2) changes in State estimates of the division of funds between substitute highway and transit projects, (3) approvals of substitute projects, and (4) the allocation and apportionment of substitute highway funds in prior fiscal years and shall use the Federal share of such adjusted and submitted estimate in making apportionments for substitute highway projects for the fiscal years ending September 30, 1985 and September 30, 1986.".

(c) Section 103(e)(4) of title 23, United States Code, is further amended by striking the existing twenty-second sentence and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "The Secretary shall make an estimate of the cost of completing substitute transit projects under this paragraph and transmit the same to the Senate and the House of Representatives within ten days subsequent to January 2, 1984. The Secretary shall adjust such cost estimate in September of 1984 and 1986 to reflect (1) changes in the amounts available to the Secretary under this paragraph, (2) changes in State estimates of the division of funds between substitute highway and transit projects, (3) approvals of substitute projects, and (4) the allocation and apportionment of substitute transit funds in prior fiscal years and shall use the Federal share of such adjusted and submitted estimate in making apportionments for substitute transit projects for the fiscal years ending September 30, 1985 and September 30, 1986.".

EMERGENCY RELIEF STATE MATCH

SEC. 107. (a) Subsection (f) of section 120 of title 23, United States Code, is amended by striking "shall not exceed 100 per centum of the cost thereof:" and inserting in lieu thereof "on account of any project on a Federal-aid highway system, including the Interstate System, shall not exceed the Federal share payable of a project on a system as provided in subsections (a) and (c) of this section: Provided, That the Federal share payable for eligible emergency repairs to minimize damage, protect facilities or restore essential traffic accomplished within thirty days after the actual occurrence may amount to 100 per centum of the costs thereof: and further".

(b) Section 120(f) of title 23, United States Code, as amended by this section is effective for all natural disasters or catastrophic failures which occur subsequent to enactment of this Act.

PRIORITY FOR INTERSTATE DISCRETIONARY FUNDS

SEC. 108. Section 118(b)(2) of title 23, United States Code, is amended by inserting after "which is not open to traffic" the following: "and high cost projects which are eligible for Federal assistance with funds apportioned under section 104(b)(5)(A) of this title and are on an Interstate segment which is on a common alignment of more than 7.9 miles with any other Interstate segment and on which actual construction with funds apportioned under such section is underway on the date of enactment of this Act;".

HIGHWAY PLANNING AND RESEARCH

SEC. 109. Section 307(c)(1) of title 23, United States Code, is amended by inserting after "section 104 of this title", the following: "and for highway projects, section 103(e)(4) of this title.".

OFF-SYSTEM BRIDGE PROGRAM

SEC. 110. Section 144, title 23, United States Code, is amended by adding a new subsection as follows:

"(n) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, with respect to any project not on a Federal-aid highway system for the replacement of a bridge 51 feet or less in length or rehabilitation of a bridge which is wholly funded from State and local sources, is eligible for Federal funds under section 144 of title 23, United States Code, is non-controversial, is certified by the State to have been carried out in accordance with all standards applicable to such projects under such section 144, and is determined by the Secretary upon completion to be no longer a deficient bridge, any amount expended after the effective date of this section, from such State and local sources for such project in excess of 20 per centum of the cost of construction thereof may be credited to the non-Federal share of the cost of other projects in such State which are eligible for Federal funds under section 144, in accordance with procedures established by the Secretary.".

WOMEN BUSINESS ENTERPRISES

SEC. 111. Section 105(f) of the Surface Transportation Assistance Act of 1982 is amended as follows:

(1) after "shall be expended with" insert "(1)", and

(2) strike the period after "thereto" and insert "and with (2) small business concerns owned and controlled by women".

TOLL FACILITY DEREGULATION

SEC. 112. (a) Section 4 of the General Bridge Act of 1906 (34 Stat. 85, 33 U.S.C. 494), as amended, is amended by deleting the last sentence thereof.

(b) Section 17 of the Act of June 10, 1930 (46 Stat. 552, 33 U.S.C. 498a), as amended, is repealed.

(c) Section 1 of the Act of June 27, 1930 (46 Stat. 821, 33 U.S.C. 498b), as amended, is repealed.

(d) Sections 1-5 of the Act of August 21, 1935 (49 Stat. 670, 33 U.S.C. 503-507), as amended, are repealed.

(e) Sections 530 and 506 of the General Bridge Act of 1946 (60 Stat. 847, 848, 33 U.S.C. 52, 529), as amended, are repealed.

(f) Section 133 of Public Law 93-87 (87 Stat. 267, 33 U.S.C. 526a) is repealed.

(g) Section 6 of the International Bridge Act of 1972 (86 Stat. 732, 33 U.S.C. 535(d)) is repealed.

(h) Section 6(g)(4) of the Department of Transportation Act (80 Stat. 937, 49 U.S.C. 1655(g)(4)) is repealed.

RAIL-HIGHWAY CROSSINGS

SEC. 113. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, no report, list, schedule or survey compiled by or for a State for the purposes of complying with any requirement of title 23, United States Code, or the Highway Safety Act of 1973 concerning the evaluation of hazardous roadway conditions or rail-highway crossings in order to plan and prioritize projects to enhance safety, shall be required to be admitted into evidence or used for any other purpose in any suit or action in any Federal or state court.

TOLL REVENUES

SEC. 114. Section 141 of title 23, United States Code, is amended by adding subsection (e) as follows:

"(e) Each State shall certify to the Secretary before January 1 of each year that the State's laws do not permit the use of toll revenues from a publicly owned or operated transportation toll facility located on a Federal-aid system except as otherwise specifically provided by Federal law for any purposes other than a purpose permitted by this title; the repayment of all the cost of construction or acquisition of such toll facility, except that part which was constructed by the United States; the proper maintenance, repair and operation of the toll facility under economical management, or any other highway-related purpose. If a State fails to certify as required by this subsection or if the Secretary determines that the State's laws do permit the use of toll revenues from a publicly owned or operated transportation toll facility for a purpose other than those permitted by this subsection, Federal-aid highway funds apportioned to the State during the next succeeding fiscal year shall be reduced by amounts equal to 5 per centum of the amount which would otherwise be apportioned to the State under section 104 of this title. Amounts withheld from apportionments to a State under this subsection shall be apportioned to the other States pursuant to the formulas of section 104 of this title and shall be available in the same manner and the same extent as other funds apportioned at the same time to other states.".

RIGHT-OF-WAY DONATION

SEC. 115. Section 120 of title 23, United States Code, is amended by adding a new subsection "(m)" as follows:

"(m) Notwithstanding any other provision of this title the fair market value of donations at the time of donation of right-of-way made for a project under this title shall be credited to the State matching share for such project when the donation is made to the State.".

RIGHT-OF-WAY PAYBACK

SEC. 116. Section 103(e)(4) of title 23, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following sentence: "Sums made available to the Secretary under this paragraph for a State shall be reduced by the amount expended in Federal funds to purchase right-of-way for the withdrawn route or segment thereof in every case where the right-of-way has not been disposed of by the State as of the date of enactment of this sentence provided that such sum shall be restored if the State applies such right-of-way to a transportation project permissible under this title, to a public conservation or public recreation purpose, or to such other public purpose as may be determined by the Secretary to be in the public interest within 10 years from the date of the withdrawal of approval.".

BRIDGE STUDY

SEC. 117 (a) The Secretary of Transportation shall conduct a study of the Bridge Replacement and Rehabilitation Program. This study shall include, but is not limited to: (1) an analysis of the progress made towards replacing and rehabilitating inadequate bridges both on the Federal-aid system and off the system; a projection of future needs of the bridge program; and an evaluation of the States' prioritization in addressing bridge repair and replacement.

(2) a review of the bridge inspection program including the adequacy of the AASHTO "Manual for Maintenance Inspection of Bridges 1983"; the adequacy of qualification requirements for bridge inspectors; the status of the bridge inventory; and the adequacy of State bridge inspections.

(3) an analysis of the effectiveness of the bridge discretionary program.

(4) a review of the bridge program's effect on the rehabilitation of historic bridges including the development of specific standards which would apply only to the rehabilitation of historic bridges, and an analysis of any other factors which would serve to enhance the rehabilitation of historic bridges.

(5) a review of the bridge formula as it affects the configuration and gross vehicle weight of large vehicles; the effect of certain large vehicles on the average life of a bridge; and the current status of and effect of grandfather rights applicable to this formula.

(b) The Secretary shall report to the Congress the results of the study under this section not later than one year after the date of enactment of this Act.

TECHNICAL AMENDMENTS

SEC. 118. (a)(1) Section 103(e)(4) of title 23, United States Code, is further amended by striking out the sixth, seventh, and eighth sentences and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "The sums apportioned and the sums allocated under this paragraph for public mass transit projects shall remain available for the fiscal year for which apportioned or allocated, as the case may be, and for the succeeding fiscal year. The sums apportioned and the sums allocated under this paragraph for projects under any highway assistance program shall remain available for the fiscal year for which apportioned or allocated, as the case may be, and for succeeding fiscal year. Any sums which are apportioned or allocated to a State for a fiscal year and are unobligated (other than an amount which, by itself, is insufficient to pay the Federal share of the cost of a substitute project which has been submitted by the State to the Secretary for approval) at the end of such fiscal year shall be apportioned or allocated, as the case may be, among those States which have obligated all sums (other than such an amount) apportioned or allocated, as the case may be, to them for such fiscal year. Such reapportionments shall be in accordance with the latest approved estimate of the cost of completing substitute projects, and such reallocations shall be at the discretion of the Secretary.".

(2) The last sentence of section 103(e)(4) of title 23, United States Code, is amended by striking out "designed" and inserting in lieu thereof "designated".

(b)(1) The second section 126 of the Surface Transportation Assistance Act of 1982, relating to bicycle transportation, is amended by striking out "SEC. 126." and inserting in lieu thereof "SEC. 126A.".

(2) Section 133 of such Act is amended by striking out "(a)" the first place it appears.

(3) Section 163 of such Act is amended by striking out "appropriated" and inserting in lieu thereof "apportioned".

(4) Section 415 of such Act is hereby repealed.

(5) The third sentence of section 108(d) of such Act is amended by striking "this title," and inserting in lieu thereof "title 23, United States Code,".

(c)(1) The analysis of chapter 1 of title 23, United States Code, is amended (1) in the item relating to section 127 by striking out "and width", and (2) by striking out the item relating to section 146 and inserting in lieu thereof:

"146. Carpool and vanpool projects.".

(2) Section 120 of such title is amended by redesignating the second subsection "(i)", and subsections "(j)" and "(k)" as subsections "(j)", "(k)", and "(l)", respectively.

(3) The first sentence of section 122 of such title is amended by inserting "or for substitute highway projects approved under section 103(e)(4) of this title" before "and the retirement".

(4)(A) Subsection (b) of section 125 of such title is amended by striking out "the Interstate System, the Primary System, and on any routes functionally classified as arterials or major collectors," each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "the Federal-aid highway systems, including the Interstate System".

(B) Subsection (c) of such section is amended by striking out "routes functionally classified as arterials or major collectors" and inserting in lieu thereof "on any of the Federal-aid highway systems".

(5) Subsection (e) of section 144 of title 23, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "Funds apportioned under this section shall be available for expenditure for the same period as funds apportioned for projects on the Federal-aid primary system under this title. Any funds not obligated at the expiration of such period shall be reapportioned by the Secretary to the other States in accordance with this subsection.".

(6) The second sentence of section 204(b) of such title is amended by inserting "the Secretary or" before "the Secretary of the Interior".

(7) The last sentence of section 402(j) of such title is amended by striking out "chapter" and inserting in lieu thereof "section".

(d) Section 111 of title 23, United States Code, is amended by inserting "(a)" before "All agreements" and by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(b) Notwithstanding subsection (a), any State may permit the placement of vending machines in rest and recreation areas, and in safety rest areas constructed or located on rights-of-way of the Interstate System in such State. Such vending machines may only dispense such food, drink, and other articles as the State highway department determines are appropriate and desirable. Such vending machines may only be operated by the State. In permitting the placement of vending machines, the State will give priority to vending machines which are operated through the State licensing agency designated pursuant to section 2(a)(5) of the Act of June 20, 1936, commonly known as the 'Randolph-Sheppard Act' (20 U.S.C. 107a(a)(5)). The costs of installation, operation, and maintenance of vending machines shall not be eligible for Federal assistance under this title.".

(e)(1) Section 145(c) of the Surface Transportation Assistance Act of 1982 is amended to read as follows:

"(c) The total amount which may be obligated for qualifying projects in any State under subsection (a) for each of the fiscal years 1983 and 1984 shall not be greater than the excess of—

"(1) the sum of the amount of obligation authority distributed to such State for such fiscal year under section 104(b) of this Act, plus the amounts, if any available to such State for such fiscal year under section 157 of title 23, United States Code, pertaining to minimum allocation, over

"(2) the amount of obligational authority distributed to such State for fiscal year 1982 under section 3(b) of the Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1981.".

(2) Section 145(e) of such Act is amended by inserting "section 108 of this Act and" after "such State under", and by striking out "104(b)(1) of title 23, United States Code," and inserting in lieu thereof "108 of this Act".

(f) Section 154(e) of title 23, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by striking out "criteria which takes" and inserting in lieu thereof "criteria which take";

(2) by inserting after "posted" the following: "on January 1, 1983,"; and

(3) by inserting before "in accordance with" the following: ", and on highways built after such date with speed limits posted as 55 miles per hour,".

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

Section 101: This section states the title.

Section 102. Interstate cost estimate approval: This section approves the Interstate Cost Estimate for the remainder of fiscal year 1985 and for fiscal year 1986. The apportionment made on March 9, 1984 would be adjusted to reflect the apportionment factors approved in the 1983 Interstate Cost Estimate.

Section 103. Interstate substitute cost estimate approval: This section approves the Interstate Substitute Cost Estimate for the remainder of fiscal year 1984 and for fiscal year 1985.

Section 104. 85 percent minimum allocation: This section directs that when the remainder of the 85 percent minimum funds are allocated, the entire allocation for fiscal year 1984 will be computed using the apportionment of Interstate construction funds based on the approved 1983 Interstate Cost Estimate.

Section 105. Release of interstate construction funds: This amendment would authorize the Secretary to apportion fiscal year 1986 through 1990 Interstate construction funds after adjusting the apportionment factors to reflect apportionments of Interstate construction funds, lapses of such funds, withdrawals of Interstate segments, allocations of Interstate discretionary funds, and Interstate transfers of funds.

Section 106. Release of interstate substitute funds: This amendment would authorize the Secretary to apportion fiscal years 1985 and 1986 Interstate substitute highway and transit funds after adjusting the Interstate Substitute Highway and Transit Cost Estimates to reflect changes in the amounts available to the Secretary, changes in States' estimates of the division of funds between substitute highway and transit projects, approvals of substitute projects and the allocation and apportionment of substitute highway and transit funds in prior fiscal years.

Section 107. Emergency relief state match: Subsection (a) provides that emergency relief repair work done within 30 days of the occurrence to restore essential services, including such things as road openings, debris removal and erection of temporary facilities, will be funded at 100 percent Federal share. Long-term restoration and replacement work will be funded with the Federal/State match applicable on each system under the regular Federal-aid highway program, e.g. 90-10 percent Federal/State match on the Interstate System, 80-20 on bridge, and 75-25 on primary, secondary and urban.

Subsection (b) provides that the match requirement applies to natural disasters of catastrophic failures which occur after the date of enactment of this Act. Such disasters or failures that occurred prior to the date of enactment would be governed by the old matching share.

Section 108. Priority for interstate discretionary funds: This section permits certain Interstate segments under construction on enactment of the 1982 STAA to receive high priority for Interstate discretionary funds when such segments have two or more Interstate routes on a common alignment in an urban area. This section is intended to apply to a project in Atlanta, Georgia.

Section 109. Highway planning and research: This section permits a State to use one and one-half percent of apportioned Interstate Highway Transfer funds for highway planning and research activities. It would not include the 25 percent of transfer funds that are allocated.

Section 110. Off-system bridge program: This section permits a State to credit State-only financed off-system bridge replacement and rehabilitation towards the State share of the Federal-aid bridge program. Off-system bridges that are non-controversial and less than 51 feet would be eligible for this program. The replacement or rehabilitation must be carried out in accordance with all standards applicable under Section 144 of title 23.

Section 111. Women business enterprises: This secton makes Women Business Enterprises a presumptive Minority Business Enterprise (MBE) for the purpose of section 105(f) of the Surface Transportation Assistance Act of 1982.

Section 112. Toll facility deregulation: This section removes Federal regulation and review of toll increases on certain toll bridges.

Section 113. Rail-highway crossings: This section provides that information identifying and prioritizing hazards at rail-highway crossings, required in order to be eligible for Federal-aid funds, cannot be used as evidence in trials involving grade crossing accidents.

Section 114. Toll revenues: This section requires States to certify that revenues derived from toll facilities are being used only for cost of construction, replacement, maintenance, and operation of the facility or any other highway related purpose. Failure by a State to certify will result in losing 5 percent of its Federal-aid highway funds.

Section 115. Right-of-way donation: This amendment would credit the fair market value of donated right-of-way at the time of donation to the State matching share if the donation was made to the State. A State would receive no credit for the excess value of a donation which exceeded the State matching share.

Section 116. Right-of-way payback: This section provides for a reduction in a State's account under 23 U.S.C. 103(e)(4) by the amount expended on right-of-way for withdrawn route or segment of the Interstate where the right-of-way has not been disposed of. Such sum shall be restored to a State's account where the State uses the right-of-way for public purpose within 10 years of the date of withdrawal of approval of the Interstate segment.

Section 117. Bridge study: This section directs the Secretary of Transportation to conduct a study of the Highway Bridge Replacement and Rehabilitation Program. The study is to address the areas of (1) progress made to date in repairing and replacing deficient bridges, (2) the adequacy of the bridge inspection program, (3) the effectiveness of the bridge discretionary program, (4) the rehabilitation of historic bridges, and (5) the bridge formula.

The Secretary shall report the findings of this study to the Congress one year after the date of enactment of this legislation.

Section 118. Technical amendments.

UNEQUIVOCAL ADMINISTRATION OPPOSITION TO THE FAIR TRADE IN STEEL ACT

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I wish to call to the attention of my colleagues an excellent letter from the U.S. Trade Representative, Ambassador Brock, and the Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Baldrige, expressing the administration's opposition to the so-called "Fair Trade in Steel Act."

The "Fair Trade in Steel Act" (S. 3280) was introduced in the Senate on March 1, with 11 Senate sponsors. It has 68 sponsors in the House. The act would authorize a 5-year legislated limit on steel imports, restricting them to no more than 15 percent of apparent domestic supply. The act is presented by its sponsors as necessary to give the steel industry breathing room to modernize and regain its competitive edge. The sponsors ignore that the steel industry has already been the beneficiary of a number of special trade arrangements—including the infamous trigger price mechanism—that have been designed to provide such breathing room.

The letter from Ambassador Brock and Secretary Baldrige expresses the administration's opposition to the fair trade in steel bill in the strongest terms. It makes what I consider to be a crucial argument. That is, that by dramatically curtailing the degree of foreign competition in the U.S. market, the global quotas proposed in this bill would insulate the industry and delay progress toward urgently needed modernization. In short, quotas would provide no breathing room to become competitive, but breathing room to remain uncompetitive.

Mr. President, I believe that steel quotas whether legislated or voluntary are contrary to the national interest and am pleased at the unequivocal opposition of the administration to the bill.

I ask unanimous consent that the letter referred to be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE U.S. TRADE REPRESENTATIVE,
Washington, D.C., March 27, 1984.

Hon. JOHN H. CHAFEE,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR CHAFEE: We are writing to express the Administration's vigorous opposition to the "Fair Trade in Steel Act of 1984", S. 2380. We ask that you give careful thought to the damage quota legislation will cause to the American economy.

This bill would impose import quotas of approximately 15 percent on steel products for a five year period. Such a wide range of arbitrarily established quotas provided outside our normal trade statutes would undermine the competitiveness of a great many industries dependent on steel as a raw material and would be highly inflationary.

The dangers posed by this legislation to our greater domestic and international economic interests are clear. While they risk great harm to the remainder of the economy, they also discourage adjustment within the steel industry itself. By dramatically curtailing the degree of foreign competition in the U.S. market, the global quotas proposed in this bill would insulate the industry and delay progress toward urgently needed modernization, cost containment and productivity. Restrictions on imports will lead to a distorted increase in the price of steel, which, in turn, will raise production costs for a wide variety of U.S. industries that make up our industrial base.

Such blatantly protectionist legislation is inconsistent with our international obligations which prohibit import restrictions without a finding of serious injury. Demands for compensation or retaliation by other countries would jeopardize thousands of U.S. jobs in other sectors. Sweeping quotas on all steel products will have an even more devastating effect on the U.S. balance of trade.

By imposing such restrictions, the bill undermines the procedures already legislated by Congress to permit industries and workers to petition for import relief through a fact-finding procedure administered by the independent U.S. International Trade Commission (ITC). Bethlehem Steel and the United Steelworkers have filed such a petition under Section 201 of the Trade Act of 1974. The case is being handled in accordance with established procedures. The ITC is currently investigating whether or not imports have been a substantial cause of serious injury.

This Administration is concerned about the possible effects of dramatic increases in aggressively priced steel imports from certain countries. Yet many of these imports are already under investigation for unfair trade practices. Since 1981, more than 100 cases dealing with steel products have been filed under the antidumping and countervailing duty statutes which offset injurious unfair government subsidies and sales at less than fair value. When such practices are found, immediate action is taken to counter the effect. We are strongly committed to preventing unfairly traded imports from undermining the integrity of our market and injuring U.S. steel producers. The Administration's record on such cases demonstrates this.

This Administration opposes the steel quota bill in the strongest possible terms. Such legislation is inconsistent with our international trade agreements and circumvents trade statutes that have proven effective when utilized correctly in response to unfair practices. Further, it will cause other U.S. industries to pay the price of protectionism through foreign retaliation and artificially increased prices. We urge your full assistance in stopping this measure.

The Office of Management and Budget has advised that there's no objection to the submission of this letter to the Congress and that enactment of S. 2380 would not be in accord with the program of the President.

Very truly yours,

MALCOLM BALDRIGE,
Secretary of Commerce.
WILLIAM E. BROCK,
U.S. Trade Representative.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Morning business has expired.

URGENT SUPPLEMENTAL FOR FISCAL YEAR 1984 PUBLIC LAW 480 PROGRAM

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will report the unfinished business.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 492) making an urgent supplemental appropriation for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1984, to the Department of Agriculture.

The Senate resumed consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I inquire now of the Senator from Michigan if he would be willing to enter into an agreement that was discussed privately last evening?

Mr. LEVIN. A 40-minute time limit?

Mr. STEVENS. A 40-minute time limit.

Mr. LEVIN. Yes.

Mr. STEVENS. Equally divided?

Mr. LEVIN. Yes.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time agreement be amended accordingly.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Michigan is recognized.

AMENDMENT NO. 2889

(Purpose: To prohibit the use of funds appropriated herein by any individual or group known by the U.S. Government to have as one of its intentions the violent overthrow of any government in Central America with which the U.S. has full diplomatic relations)

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Michigan (Mr. LEVIN) proposes an amendment numbered 2889:

At the end of the bill, insert the following: "No funds appropriated herein for covert assistance in Central America can be provided to any individual or group which is not part of a country's armed forces and which is known by the U.S. Government to have as one of its intentions the violent overthrow of any government in Central America with which the U.S. Government has full diplomatic relations."

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, this amendment is offered on behalf of Senator INOUYE and myself.

After the debate yesterday on the Senate floor, it is clear that it is a matter of some dispute as to what is the purpose of our covert aid in Central America. But what appears beyond dispute, based on yesterday's debate and earlier statements of the administration, is what is not a purpose of that assistance. The purpose of our assistance is not to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua.

On April 23, 1983, the President stated:

Let us be clear as to the American attitude toward the Government of Nicaragua. We do not seek its overthrow.

Only yesterday, the President wrote the majority leader a letter in which he stated:

The United States does not seek to destabilize or overthrow the Government of Nicaragua.

The amendment which we are offering today merely seeks to codify these representations into law by saying that none of the funds appropriated in this bill for covert assistance in Central America can be provided to any individual or group which is known by the U.S. Government to have as one of its intentions the violent overthrow of any government in Central America with which the U.S. Government has full diplomatic relations. The State Department has informed me that the United States currently has full diplomatic relations with the Government of Nicaragua.

This amendment also seeks to emphasize the sincerity of our stated policy by making it clear it should not be demeaned by a fiction that the intention with which we render covert assistance can be nullified by the known intentions of the person or group which receives the covert assistance. If our policy of not seeking the overthrow of the Nicaraguan Government is a good policy, then it should be a sincere policy, seriously adhered to. And if it is a sincere policy, then the basic principles of agency law should apply—our agents in Central America should be bound by our intentions. Does not our basic self-respect as a nation require that we not be manipulated by the whims of others? Only if we hide behind narrow semantics, could we believe that we would want our assistance to be used for any purpose other than our stated intentions.

If we give a gun to someone and our intention is that it be used for self-protection but find out that it is that person's true purpose to rob a bank, we would quickly want that gun back. Likewise, sincere and credible implementation of our policy not to overthrow the Nicaraguan Government requires that we make sure the recipients of our covert assistance have the same purposes as we do.

And these purposes are not the result of ephemeral policy decisions, incautiously arrived at. No, they are based on our most fundamental ideas as a nation. They are premised on the principles which have made us not only different as a nation but great as a people. It is these principles that led us to sign the Charter of Organization of American States which states:

No State or group of States has the right to intervene, directly or indirectly, for any reason whatever, in the internal or external affairs of any other State.

It is the obligation of our country not to attempt to overthrow other nations in our hemisphere. It is our purpose, and it should be the purpose of the U.S. Senate, to make clear that we are not supplying funds that are intended to overthrow a government with which we have full diplomatic relations. We may not like the Nicaraguan Government. I certainly do not. The Nicaraguan Government has not restored human rights and political freedoms. But that does not give us the right to covertly or overtly try to overthrow the Nicaraguan Government.

If our intention was to overthrow the Nicaraguan Government through assistance to the Contra forces, then it would be a self-defeating and shortsighted policy. In doing so, we would be confirming the worst fears about U.S. motives throughout the region. As the Los Angeles Times editoralized on April 2, 1984:

If anything, the CIA's not-so-secret war has helped the most ardent revolutionaries strengthen their grip on Nicaragua. It has given the most extreme Sandinistas an excuse to crack down on internal dissent, and has increased their popular support by allowing them to pose as nationalists standing up to Yankee pressure.

In addition, recent reports that the Nicaraguan Government is seeking minesweepers from the Soviet Union and North Korea in response to the mining of Corinto Harbor would seem to be exactly opposite from what should be the desired goal of our policy. Pushing the Nicaraguans further into the arms of the Soviet Union is not the way to diminish Russian influence in Nicaragua or in South America.

If it is true that we do not seek to overthrow the Nicaraguan Government, if it is true that we have treaty obligations not to seek the overthrow of that Government, if it is true that it would be an undignified fiction that our agents can be allowed to use our assistance in a manner contrary to our intentions—if all this is true, and I hope it is, the Senate should have no hesitation in stating that the funds we are voting for here are simply not to be used to overthrow any government in Central America with which we have full diplomatic relations. We should say for the record, now that we are going ahead and voting the $21 million, that we do not want this money to be used for purposes that will violate our stated policies, our treaty obligations, and our moral tradition.

Again, all this amendment does is seek to codify in this appropriation bill the stated intentions of this administration with respect to the overthrow of the Nicaraguan Government, and to seek to convey the seriousness of those intentions by prohibiting the use of covert assistance by any person or group whose intentions are different from our own. It is important to our credibility as a nation that our intentions be clearly understood. But if anybody is going to believe our stated policy, it must be rigorously adhered to by those we put in a position of implementing our policy.

Mr. INOUYE addressed the Chair.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Who yields time?

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Hawaii as much of the remainder of my time as he may need.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, last evening, the Senate of the United States, by an overwhelming vote, supported the use of funds by the President of the United States to carry on covert activities in Nicaragua. That heavy vote resulted from a letter dated April 4 and addressed to our majority leader. It was a letter of assurances, and I think it is worthy of repetition. This historic letter said:

The United States does not seek to destabilize or overthrow the Government of Nicaragua; nor to impose or compel any particular form of government there.

This amendment is very simple. All it does, as the author has indicated, is to attempt to codify that assurance. It further reaffirms this country's support for article 18 of the OAS Charter.

So, Mr. President, I hope the Senate will go on record, first, to support the President of the United States in his assurance that it is not the intention of this country to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua and, second, to reaffirm as we have done many, many times—article 18 of the OAS Charter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I yield myself such time as I may use.

I ask Senator LEVIN and Senator INOUYE, or either one, a question.

We have voted now that the program underway will continue. The funding, as I understand it, is as approved by the Intelligence Committee. It is known that that funding is currently being used for support of a group known as the Contras, which is not part of the armed forces of any country.

Is this not another amendment to cut off all aid to the Nicaragua Contras?

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, that is not the intention of this amendment.

If my good friend from Alaska will read further, it says if this organization has "as one of its intentions the violent overthrow of any government."

If we are assured and if we believe that the Contras are not in the business of overthrowing the Government of Nicaragua, this amendment says we may provide them with all the funds we wish to, as long as the intention of the President of the United States, as set forth in his letter of April 4, is carried out.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, that is just the issue. That is our intention, the intention of the United States.

I remember well, during the war in China, that my squadron supported the Communist Chinese. We were directly in support of the Chinese Nationalist Government, but we also provided aid and assistance to Communist Chinese to fight the Japanese.

The world knows of the differences between the partisans in Yugoslavia. We supported both sides in order to achieve our objective, which was to defeat the Nazis.

What this amendment says is that we have to provide money under this program only to those who take a loyalty oath to the President of the United States and who say, "We are going to go out there in the field and do exactly what the President of the United States says this money is for." Or, you could give the money to the Sandinistas. Under this amendment, we could turn the money over to the Sandinistas. I am sure the Senator would agree with that. That is not what this is all about.

With respect to the hypothetical situation I used last night, I was reading the RECORD this morning to see if it came through as I stated it, and I thank God that it did. I congratulate the official reporters again for being able to make sense out of some of our hastily put-together examples.

These forces in Nicaragua—again I challenge anyone to prove I am wrong—in my opinion, are the most heavily armed people on the face of the Earth today. They have forces and tanks on the border of Costa Rica, which has no military at all. They have forces on the border of El Salvador, and they are providing El Salvador rebels with guns. They have forces on the border of Honduras, and they have attacked Honduras.

There is a group of their partisans who do not like their government, who would like to overthrow their government. They have said so. Our President has said, "We will provide you enough assistance so that you could put pressure on this government."

The U.S. Government does not have any intention to try to overthrow that Government. That is not our objective. Our objective is to force them into the bargaining rooms, where we can deal with the Contadora process, so that they will do what they said last July: go ahead with the 21 points, offer amnesty to the insurgents and discuss their military budget, and turn again to the concept of civil rights of their people and democracy within their borders, if that is their desire, but at least a government that meets the needs of the people.

I view this the same as the situation when I was part of the group supplying the Chinese Communists. Our objective was to defeat the Japanese. Our objective here is to get these people back to the table.

Incidentally, I urge Members to go down and talk to them. I think the Senator from Hawaii has talked to the Contras. They live on the run. They have no mobility except their feet. They are living in their own country; and if they did not have some support, they would have been annihilated long ago. They are a force that is less than 8 percent of the force they face. They are operating with 10 percent of the money, for their total budget, that the other force is putting into military construction—into one airfield.

We are not supporting any effort to overthrow the Government, but this amendment, in my opinion, would accomplish every objective that the other amendments we voted down would accomplish. It would say we can no longer support the Contra group because that Contra group longs for the day when it had democracy. They long for the day that they would be able to participate in their Government.

They have been ostracized by their Government because they do not support the Sandinistas.

To say that we cannot assist them is to say there is no way to keep pressure on them. And what would happen? Again we would have intrusions coming into Honduras. The flow of arms into El Salvador would again go up to the level it was before this process started.

And no one has denied that one of the results of the Contra process has, in fact, been the reduction of the flow of arms into El Salvador. No one can deny that it has, in fact, taken the troops from the border of Honduras and put them around where they are guarding their airfields, they are guarding their POL facilities, they are guarding the places that have been subject to the Contra attacks, and that is exactly what the process is for.

The program has been successful. We have had significant progress and we are not talking about all the specifics here—those are again classified—but we are authorized to say that there have been conciliatory gestures delivered to our Government and the Intelligence Committee and our committee knows about it.

They are more willing now to look to some way to curb this fantastic military growth, and it is absolutely in the best interest of this country to see to it that that growth stops.

As I mentioned last night, since the time we debated this last year, they have gone up more than a third in terms of just the number of Soviet tanks that are on the line in Nicaragua. They have gone up now to three battalions of Soviet tanks—three battalions.

That whole country would fit in an area that is known as the Kenai Peninsula in my State. It is about one-ninth, or one-tenth of the size of the State of Alaska. It is roughly the size of Tennessee.

Can you imagine having three battalions of tanks on the borders of every State around Tennessee? Can you imagine having 60 armored personnel carriers, when they have very few roads in their own country? The only roads that go out of that country that make any sense are the inter-American highway connections.

They have Soviet and Korean patrol boats. They have military transport planes, troop carrying transport planes now, in an area where their neighbor Costa Rica has no military at all, and a dictator the Sandinistas deposed, that terrible Somosa, had 9,000 national guardsmen—9,000. And this regime has over 100,000 available like that, just at the snap of his fingers.

This Contra activity is the only thing that is keeping those people busy. It is the only thing making them think about what might happen to them should they become the pawn of the Soviet-Cuban foreign policy and decide to take that Soviet-Cuban force also bolstered by the East Germans outside of the borders of Nicaragua.

Mr. President, I know of nothing that would justify the military buildup that has taken place in Nicaragua just since last December; 14 to 18 attack helicopters, the new Soviet attack helicopters, are there. There are 14 to 18 of them down there in Nicaragua, and the clock is ticking on Nicaragua, and this loyalty oath amendment will say the Contras get no more money after the date it passes, and I frankly tell my friend from Hawaii I just do not believe that it is possible to live with that amendment and to do what the Intelligence Committee has already told our committee should be done, and that is make available $7 million now and $14 million in the future at the request of the President of the United States if the existing law is complied with, and that is the Intelligence Committee procedures, not the Appropriations Committee procedures.

So we have relied on the Intelligence Committee. They told us this money should be authorized. They were fully briefed as to whom was getting it right now, what it is being used for; and the bulk of it is being used for small arms, for medical supplies, for ammunition. They told us there is only one person in the Contra outfit who is getting paid, and that is a radio operator. They did not have a radio operator so they had to hire a person. Every other person in that Contra group is a volunteer. There is no money being paid for salaries. This is strictly support of their partisan group, and it is as partisan as Tito's group was in World War II, and they are after the same objective we are, and that is to bring that government to the bargaining table. Sure, they are saying that they are seeking to overthrow him. What would you tell your people if you are out there in the field and being shot at? "Go ahead, boys, stand up and fight because we might get these guys to the bargaining table?"

The question of the bargaining table for them is ultimately amnesty, and they know that. If this stops, there will be no amnesty for those people and the people we have supported, 8,000 strong, will be murdered. They will be executed. They will no longer be able to defend themselves, and whoever votes for this amendment is voting not for the concept of terrorism, as the Senator from Connecticut said last night, but strictly for execution.

This is an amendment that will bring about the execution of 8,000 people who have sought to put pressure on that fantastic source of military power in Central America.

I just cannot support it and I cannot understand supporting it in view of the Intelligence Committee record which says that the existing program should go on, and again I ask the sponsor of the amendment how could this permit the people who are in the field now, whose ammunition we know runs out about the 1st of May from not being overrun? Unless we get not just dollars to them but ammunition to them by the 1st of May they will be overrun. How does this help them?

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, may I have some time to respond?

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, how much time do I have remaining?

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Ten minutes and ten seconds.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I am happy to yield 5 additional minutes to the Senator from Hawaii.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, I have had the privilege of serving on the Intelligence Committee from its birth 8 years ago. I have had the privilege and honor of serving as its first chairman.

When the Intelligence Committee, by an almost unanimous vote, approved the appropriation of $21 million to be used in that part of the world for covert activities, it was done with the understanding that none of these funds would be expended for the overthrow of Nicaragua.

Mr. President, this amendment has nothing to do with the loyalty oath. There is a basic principle involved, one that all attorneys in the United States are fully aware of and one of the first things one learns in law school in American jurisprudence—the law of agency, the principle and agent. The principle shall be responsible for the acts of the agent if he is aware of those acts or if he should have been aware of these acts or if he authorized the agent to act.

We cannot very innocently provide money knowing that that money will be illegally spent. We cannot provide money knowing that that person will violate article 18 of the OAS Charter and then say we had nothing to do with it.

If any more ships sink in the Nicaraguan harbor, we cannot say we have nothing to do with this, that all we did was provide the money, and we cannot tell the world we had no idea that the Contras had this in mind.

Some day, if we do not adopt this type of amendment, we may find ourselves being responsible for a horrendous act that will lead us to overt war.

So, Mr. President, this is a very basic amendment, I think one of the most important amendments that we have had before us in this debate.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield right there?

Mr. INOUYE. I am happy to yield.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, would the Senator agree to amend this to say that the money would not be used to support a policy by the U.S. Government which would in any way seek to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua or any other government in Central America rather than say we have to go to the feelings expressed by these people who are partisans?

I talked to those partisans. There is no question they would like to overthrow their government. No question about it. You talked to them. They would not get any money under this amendment.

Now that certainly is not my intention. I have the letter here from the President of the United States. And there is no question that he says:

> The United States does not seek to destabilize or overthrow the Government of Nicaragua; nor to impose or compel any particular form of government there.

Now I support that and the Senator supports that. The Senator is interpreting this amendment to mean what the President said apparently. Is that his intent?

Mr. INOUYE. If I may respond, Mr. President, what I am trying to say, very simply, is that we cannot have a document saying we are against murder and provide money to someone else to commit murder. We would be responsible for that act. And, likewise, if we know that the Contras are out to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua, we have no business providing funds to that group. That is the issue before us. If the Contras have, as the purpose and intention of their mission, what we have as our purpose and intent, fine. But if it is to destabilize that government and to overthrow that government, then, Mr. President, this amendment should be in effect. Because, otherwise, we would be violating article 18 of the OAS Charter, and we are a signatory. We would be violating the conditions set forth by the Senate Intelligence Committee. We would be violating the conditions set forth by the House Intelligence Committee. So, Mr. President, I hope that the Senate in overwhelming numbers supports this matter.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time yielded to the Senator has expired.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I yield myself 3 minutes.

Mr. President, the issue here is whether or not we are serious and whether or not we want to be taken seriously when we say that we do not seek to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua. That is the only issue. The President said it again yesterday. The President has said it on a number of occasions. Indeed, the floor manager, I believe, said it yesterday, that it is not our intention to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua. Nobody is going to believe us. We will have no credibility. Nobody is going to rely on our word if we provide money to individuals or groups who do intend to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua.

The only question is, Do we want to be believed and is anyone going to believe us?

Now, I think it would be shameful for the Senate, on an appropriation bill, not to state clearly the policy of this country. It is not the policy to overthrow the Government in Nicaragua. We want to believe our President. He told it to us yesterday. Everybody wants to believe our President, whether we happen to be in the same party or not. He is our President. He is the only President we have. He has assured the world it is not our policy to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua. All this amendment says is, then do not use these appropriated funds to violate our stated policy.

We cannot hide behind a fiction and say, "Oh, we are serious" and still give funds to a group or to individuals who violate our own intentions. That is what appropriations bills are for, to appropriate money for a purpose. And if our purpose is not to overthrow a government with whom we have full diplomatic relations, then we should say so. "It is not our purpose and we are not going to let this money be spent in that way."

It would discredit the Senate, in my opinion, to reject an amendment which does nothing more than state clearly what this country's purpose is. And it would be shameful for us to send a message out that yesterday we said it is not our intention to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua but today the U.S. Senate says we are going to give money to groups who want to do just that.

Nobody is going to believe us, folks. If you were in Central America or if you lived outside of this country, indeed, if you lived in this country, who is going to believe us if this amendment is rejected, which puts in legislative language nothing more than what the President of the United States has said, what has been said over and over again by the Intelligence Committee, by the floor manager and others? "It is not our intention to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua."

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has used 3 minutes.

Mr. STEVENS. How much time remains, Mr. President?

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alaska has 7 minutes and 8 seconds and the Senator from Michigan has 2 minutes and 13 seconds.

(Mr. SYMMS assumed the chair.)

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, plainly and simply, when we voted the money last year, $24 million that has been used and will be used through May, we made a covert program a matter of public knowledge. Many of us thought that it ought to be overt at the time and I have no problem about it being overt except for the problem of the lives of the people involved. That is a difficult thing, to hold hearings and ask of the Contras to come up here and testify and say, "Now, where are you going to go in February and where are you going to go in March and where are you going to go in April and where are you going to shoot your last ammunition just before the 1st of May?"

I think that when we really looked at it, calmer heads prevailed and said it is a covert operation because the lives of people involved are at stake. We did it primarily because we had knowledge of what went on.

We should be aware of what the Sandinistas are supporting.

I am trying to find that Wall Street Journal editorial on what happened in just 1 day as a result of Communist supported guerrilla activity. I remember in 1 day bullets were sprayed on a schoolbus; a grenade was put in the hand of a person who was standing in a mass of children.

In terms of the Honduras intrusion, we flew down into the area where that intrusion took place. It is a quiet delta country that until the last few years has not even had a road. People live in abject poverty. Most people that are in their sixties had never seen a doctor in their lives. They were subject to an attack all of a sudden, out of the night, by this armed might that I have been talking about from Nicaragua, not once but on many occasions. They suddenly found themselves overwhelmed without any defense at all. They had not even known military power in the past.

Now that has ceased. Those women and children in Honduras are no longer being killed. Their farms are no longer being burned. The amount of arms going into El Salvador has been reduced and that country now has held not one but two elections and will soon hold a third one in which I do not know of anyone who was reported being killed standing in line for up to 6 and 7 hours waiting to vote, notwithstanding the commitment that was made by guerrillas to destroy the vote.

You ask what the Contra process has brought about. They have, in fact, brought about the diversion that we described last night, that military force is backing away from the borders and it is now guarding in a defensive way those installations that have importance to the country of Nicaragua from a military point of view.

And as I said, there are gestures of a conciliatory nature saying we would like to be back in the Contadora process.

Again, those people that are in the field are fighting for something that they believe in—a different kind of government for Nicaragua. I do not endorse that. I have never said we are going to provide them funds in order to bring about and achieve an overthrow of the Government of Nicaragua. We have said that we believe that what they are doing is consistent with our goals to bring about a realization in Nicaragua that the military aggressiveness that they practiced in the past will not be successful.

Mr. President, the main thing about this amendment is that this amendment would in fact accomplish what all of the amendments we have defeated so far would accomplish. Without question, it would mean that the people that are in the field now who have stated to interviewers that that was their goal, to overthrow that government that is there in their country now, but, yes, they are doing what they are doing and they know what they are doing is bringing pressure on their government, so they are achieving our objective and dreaming that they might achieve theirs. That would be a force that would no longer be able to receive any ammunition. Again, Mr. President, I tell you we would read in the paper that 6,000 to 8,000 people were murdered right after the first of May. They would be executed without any question. I talked to their leaders. I saw pictures of their little tents that they fold up and the boards they put down to have a floor in that country where it rains so hard. They carry them on their backs. They cannot move very far in Nicaragua when they are being pursued with over 100,000 people with attack helicopters, flamethrowers, and every modern piece of weaponry that the Soviets and the Cubans can pour into Nicaragua.

We are talking about $7 million in the first installment, which would be enough to keep that group going for maybe 40 days. And then another $14 million which would keep them going probably until the end of September. Hopefully, by that time Nicaragua will do what it says it will do. It will be back at the OAS table. It will go back to the Contadora process, and then we might have some hope for restoring peace down there. But should this amendment pass, I can assure you of one thing. There are 100,000 people from Nicaragua and Costa Rica—I have not even mentioned that. That was a figure I got yesterday—refugees who arrived there within the last 6 months. Costa Rica does not know what to do with them. We can expect, Mr. President, half a million refugees from Nicaragua to come into the United States, if the Contadora process stops. There is no way to stop that flood of refugees once the executions of the Contras take place.

I am prepared to vote, if the Senator is prepared to vote.

● Mr. EAST. Mr. President, the measure we are considering today, House

Joint Resolution 492, contains a provision appropriating $21,000,000 to be used to aid the so-called Contras, the freedom fighters now engaged in armed resistance against the Marxist Sandinista regime in Nicaragua. I support this measure, and I oppose amendments to the resolution that would delete or resist these funds.

There is no greater testimonial of the commitment of the people of Nicaragua to freedom and their hatred of communism than the growth of partisan resistance to the Nicaraguan regime. These freedom fighters have been called, by some in this Chamber, "thugs" and "terrorists," but nothing could be further from the truth. The Contras consist for the most part of Indians, peasants, small landowners, and others who have been persecuted by the Sandinista regime. Only some 2 percent of one of the main Contra organizations consists of former members of the national guard of President Somoza. The Contras consist principally of two organizations, the Nicaraguan Democratic Front (FDN), and the Democratic Revolutionary Alliance (ARDE). The FDN, operating in northern Nicaragua near the Honduran border, has a force of some 10,000 combatants, while the ARDE, operating in southern Nicaragua near the border of Costa Rica, has about 4,000 combatants. A total of 14,000 combatants, therefore, are involved in a guerrilla war against the Marxist Nicaraguan regime, a regime that is the most powerful military force in Central America, which since its inception in 1979 has received some $265 million in military assistance from the Soviet Union and Cuba, which has at least 2,000 military advisers from Cuba and about 85 from the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe, and which has an army of some 138,000 troops.

Mr. President, it is absurd to argue, as some opponents of this appropriation have, that the purpose of American support for the Contras is to overthrow the Sandinista regime. It is virtually inconceivable that the Contras at their present level of force, can accomplish this, nor could they with the proposed $21,000,000. If the United States wished to overthrow the Sandinista junta, surely we could find more effective means to do so than by supporting the Contras. This fact alone should allay the expressed suspicions of the opponents of this appropriation that the overthrow of the Sandinistas is our real purpose.

Furthermore, Mr. President, both President Reagan and leading spokesmen for the administration have already and repeatedly stated, and the legislative history of this resolution will show, that our purpose in providing covert aid to the Contras is not to overthrow the Sandinistas but to assist in the interdiction of arms secretly provided to the terrorist allies of the Sandinistas in El Salvador.

This purpose is an entirely legal and legitimate one. It is part of the President's authority to conduct, through the Central Intelligence Agency, covert action. The appropriation has been considered and approved by the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, and the chairman of that committee, my distinguished colleague from Arizona, spoke very ably to that point yesterday. As the Senator from Arizona pointed out, the Treaty of the Organization of America States as well as the Treaty of Rio de Janeiro impose an obligation on their signatories to come to the aid of other signatories who are defending themselves against armed aggression. The Sandinista regime, with the active help of Cuba, the Soviet Union, and the PLO, is actively engaged in arming and assisting terrorist subversion against El Salvador, Guatemala, and Honduras. Our aid to El Salvador, as well as our covert assistance to the Contras, is our part in defending these allied governments aginst Communist aggression. American support of the Contras is therefore proper and legal in every respect.

Some opponents of this appropriation, Mr. President, have argued that our aid to the Contras has a destabilizing effect in Central America. The plain truth is, however, that it is not the United States or the Contras who are destabilizing that region, and the United States is not the only country providing aid to the Contras, who operate against the real aggressors and destabilizers from Nicaragua and Cuba.

To eliminate or restrict the funds proposed for the Contras would in fact be perceived in Latin America as a weakening of our will and of our commitments to resist Cuban and Nicarguan aggression there. It would be so perceived by the leaders and people of El Salvador, by the people of Nicaragua, by the Contras and their supporters within Nicaragua, and by the leaders and peoples of all Latin American countries that have reason to fear Communist aggression and subversion. It would be one more signal of isolationism, lack of a policy for Central America, and an abandonment of our traditional role and responsibilities toward this region. The elimination or restriction of these funds would be so perceived, not because the peoples of Latin America believe we are trying to overthrow the Sandinistas, but because they would see that the Senate of the United States is not making use of what is legally permitted our Government to oppose aggression and to support our allies, and they would come to believe that America is not serious about aiding those who oppose the subversion of the Central American subcontinent by the forces of international communism.●

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I am voting to table this amendment, just as I voted to table Amendment No. 2888 last night, because I do not believe that it is realistic to define limitations on funding as proposed by Senator DODD in Amendment No. 2888 or by Senator LEVIN in this amendment.

I voted against the funding of $21 million for covert aid to Nicaragua because I believe that such covert aid, which is essentially directed to harass or to overthrow the Nicaraguan Government, is counterproductive to a long-range solution in the region. As previously noted, it is my view that negotiations should be undertaken through the Contradora process with participation by the United States.

Once the appropriation of $21 million was passed, it is my judgment that the limitations attempted by these amendments are meaningless and dilatory.

I believe we should now move ahead with the balance of this bill and the budget measures which are scheduled for consideration after final action on this appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I yield myself 1 minute.

The issue here is whether or not we mean what we say. Everybody is for democracy in Nicaragua. We hope someday we can restore it. Everyone shares in the mistakes of the Nicaraguan Government in some of their activities, including the export of revolution. We have decided as a country, as an administration and as a Senate that it is not our intent to violently overthrow any government with which we have diplomatic relations. That is all. We cannot hide behind any fiction and say, well, that is not our intention and then supply arms to people who violate our own intention.

My friend from Alaska said during the debate that they are after the same objectives that we are. If that is true, this amendment would not indeed stop $1 of aid to the Contras. It is only if their intention is different and inconsistent with our intention. It is only if they want to do something which we vow we do not want to do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator yield 1 minute?

Mr. LEVIN. I thank the Chair.

I yield myself 1 additional minute.

It is only if they want to do something that we vow is not our intent that we would not be able to supply them with funds. So it comes down to our own credibility, our own sense of whether or not we want to be taken seriously with our words and whether or not we think anybody is going to believe a fiction that, oh, no, we do not want to overthrow a government with whom we have diplomatic relations while at the same time we supply individuals or groups that have exactly that intention. This does not stop aid to anybody. It requires that anyone who receives our aid be carrying out our intention and not violate our word. That is all it does.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. STEVENS. Is the Senator prepared to yield back time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Twenty-two seconds are left to the Senator from Michigan, and 10 seconds are left to the Senator from Alaska.

Mr. LEVIN. I am happy to yield back.

Mr. STEVENS. We graciously yield back that time.

I move to table the amendment and ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Alaska to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Michigan. On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Vermont (Mr. STAFFORD) is absent on official business.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Colorado (Mr. HART) and the Senator from Georgia (Mr. NUNN) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. BURDICK) and the Senator from Arizona (Mr. DECONCINI) are absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 51, nays 44, as follows:

[Rollcall Vote No. 54 Leg.]

YEAS—51

So the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. LEVIN. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 2890

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Tennessee (Mr. SASSER) proposes an amendment numbered 2890.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 6, line 12 after the word "Congress" strike all through line 16 and add the following: "; Provided, That temporary facilities previously or hereinafter constructed, modified or improved in Honduras, in whole or in part utilizing operations and maintenance funds of the Department of Defense, shall be available solely for the conduct of military training exercises unless such facilities are deemed necessary for the evacuation or self-defense of U.S. personnel: Provided further, except as specifically authorized and appropriated by Congress no funds appropriated to the Department of Defense may be obligated or expended to upgrade or convert to permanent use for any military or paramilitary organization any temporary facility previously or hereinafter constructed, modified or improved in Honduras, in whole or in part utilizing operations and maintenance funds of the Department of Defense.".

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. SASSER. I yield.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, this is the amendment, I believe, that I have discussed with the distinguished Senator from Tennessee, and we have agreed that the time limit would be 2 hours, 1 hour on each side.

Mr. SASSER. I say to my friend from Alaska that that is agreeable with the Senator from Tennessee, with the stipulation, which I think is agreeable to the Senator from Alaska, that we have an up-and-down vote on this matter.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, on this vote, we have no problem with an up-and-down vote. I will state that I may have an amendment to the amendment. That will come out in the debate. It may be possible to avoid that.

There is time under the existing agreement for amendments in the second degree, is there not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time on the Senator's amendment be limited to an hour on each side, and I state to the Senator that we will not make a motion to table this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SASSER. I thank the Senator from Alaska.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MATTINGLY). Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

I offer this amendment on behalf of myself and Mr. INOUYE, Mr. BINGAMAN, Mr. PELL, Mr. WEICKER, Mr. EAGLETON, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. GLENN, Mr. ZORINSKY, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. EXON, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. FORD, Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. TSONGAS, Mr. BAUCUS, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. BIDEN, Mr. MELCHER, Mr. PRYOR, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. BOREN, and Mr. LEVIN.

Mr. President, as this debate proceeds today here in the Senate, U.S. combat engineers are in the process of building yet two more airfields in Honduras.

One is being built near the Nicaraguan border, and the other only a few miles from El Salvador. These two construction sites are near the scenes of recent armed conflict. The Contras and the Nicaraguan armed forces are presently engaged in fighting less than 20 miles from Jamastran, the site of the airfield near the Nicaraguan border. There is a danger that U.S. troops could be drawn into this fighting if it spreads.

However, despite the risk involved—the risk of troops getting caught in crossfire—these construction projects are being undertaken without specific approval of Congress. In fact, the appropriate congressional committees were not even consulted before ordering these airfields built.

The two airfields presently under construction will bring to eight the number of airfields the administration has ordered constructed in Honduras since the Big Pine I exercises began a little more than a year ago.

In addition, the Big Pine I exercises and the subsequent exercises have been used as a pretense to construct radar installations, base camps, and training facilities throughout this small nation, roughly the size of my native State of Tennessee.

In all, the United States will have built or have access to 14 separate military installations in Honduras by the end of the Grenadero I exercises currently underway.

What is most disturbing about this substantial military buildup in Honduras is that most of the construction has taken place with virtually no public notice and with no specific approval from Congress.

The administration has built an extensive network of military facilities in Honduras—a military infrastructure capable of supporting a major armed intervention by U.S. military forces.

Indeed, it has been reported by one publication of some renown in this country that the 82d Airborne Division could be put into the country of Honduras in only one afternoon, utilizing the airfields and airstrips that have been built.

We have had no report as to exactly why we are building these facilities in Honduras or precisely what the objectives of the U.S. policy are in that small country.

Mr. President, I submit that we, as Members of the Congress, would be neglecting our responsibilities if we allow this situation to continue—military facilities to be constructed willy-nilly, on and on into the future.

The amendment I bring before the Senate today seeks to restore integrity to the congressional process with regard to U.S. military construction activities in Honduras. My amendment has two very simple, moderate, and eminently reasonable provisions:

First, it would prohibit the use of facilities constructed from operation and maintenance funds of the Department of Defense in Honduras for any purpose other than the conduct of military training exercises.

The ostensible reason given for constructing these facilities and these bases and these airfields is that they are needed for training. We are told that they are simply incidental to the exercises or maneuvers that are taking place in Honduras. So who could object, then, to the first provision of my amendment requiring that they be used only for military training?

Second, it would prohibit the Department of Defense from using operation and maintenance funds to convert any of these facilities to permanent use for any military or paramilitary organization.

The opponents of this legislation claim that other than two military construction projects approved by Congress the United States is building only temporary facilities that are needed solely for the military maneuvers. If that is the case, then I expect they will support this amendment because it does not prohibit the construction of purely temporary facilities that are to be used simply for exercises or training maneuvers in Honduras.

But I would be derelict, Mr. President, if I did not state to my colleagues here today that my trip to Honduras 7 weeks ago and a careful review of the facts available about U.S. activities in that country make it, I think, clear that many of these facilities are permanent and semipermanent and they go far beyond what is needed to conduct military exercises.

Let me cite some evidence as to the permanent nature of these facilities:

The General Accounting Office conducted an extensive investigation of this matter and determined that the United States was, and I quote from that report, "engaged in a continuing, if not permanent, military presence in Honduras."

That report was classified, and I am not at liberty to divulge all of the contents here today in an open session, but a number of my colleagues have received a classified briefing from the General Accounting Office auditors, and I am confident that they will confirm that the GAO has essentially confirmed my findings in this matter as to the permanence of the facility.

When I visited Honduras, I was told that exercises are planned there for at least 5 more years.

Prior to going to Honduras, I was told by officers from the Pentagon that we had no plans for exercises beyond the fall of this year.

Upon my return from that country, I read a New York Times dispatch which indicated that the exercises would be conducted in the country of Honduras for up to 20 years.

Now, I submit that hardly supports the contention that these facilities are only "temporary" in nature.

Let me give you another example:

Over a year ago the Seabees of the U.S. Navy improved an airfield at a location called Puerto Lempira on the east coast of Honduras. This is one of the so-called temporary airfields. But Puerto Lempira is still being used today. It was used during Big Pine II and southern command officials have told me that it will be used during Big Pine III, another exercise next year. So this is typical of the so-called temporary dirt airstrip still in use after 2 years, still able to handle traffic and accommodate 155,000-pound C-130's that will be landing there.

Then at Aguacate, another base close to the Nicaraguan border, the Engineers of the U.S. Army have lengthened an existing 4,300 foot runway, which is capable of handling C-130 traffic to 8,000 feet.

Mr. President, I walked that runway with a young captain who was in charge of the Army Engineers company which constructed it, a brilliant young officer, a graduate of the engineering school at Georgia Tech, holder of a master's degree in civil engineering from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. That young officer was very proud of this 8,000-foot airfield that he constructed there and he pointed out how he moved a large hill, how he had diverted a stream, and how he had constructed, along with his colleagues, a very elaborate concrete culvert system under the runway to handle the drainage. That is hardly what I would call a temporary facility. Those officers present the day I visited took great pride in indicating that this facility would stand the strain of the weather for years to come.

Now, we learn that the commander of the Southern Command, General Gorman, acting as his own authorizing and appropriating committee, has approved the construction of a parking apron and an aircraft turnaround to go with the 8,000-foot runway at Aguacate.

A C-130, which we use to supply our exercises and maneuvers, can land on a 3,000-foot runway so the only possible explanation for an 8,000-foot runway is that it is intended to be utilized at some juncture by jet attack aircraft or jet fighter bombers.

Mr. President, last year Congress passed, and the President signed into law, a requirement that the Committees on Appropriations be provided with a detailed construction plan for the country of Honduras regarding further U.S. military construction in that country.

The bill was signed into law by the President on October 11. To date, Congress has not received that report from the Pentagon, and Pentagon officials have told me that we will not receive this detailed construction report until May or June of this year, some 8 or 9 months after it became necessary by law that they advise this Congress of their plans for military construction in Honduras.

Since that bill was signed into law last October, the Pentagon has built or improved three new airfields at San Lorenzo, Trujillo, and Aguacate.

In addition, a sophisticated radar site has been established at Tiger Island and is being manned by elements of the U.S. Marine Corps. And two additional airfields will be built this month, as I indicated earlier.

So, no wonder the construction report has been withheld. No wonder the law has not been complied with.

Before Congress receives the report that was mandated on October 11, 1983, the Pentagon will more than have doubled the size of the military infrastructure in Honduras.

The question we must ask is for what purpose? Why has the administration embarked on this military buildup?

That question has not been answered.

What we are seeing in the country of Honduras is an attempt by the administration to stretch the definition of "temporary" to include whatever they want to build. But, this debate should not degenerate into a question of semantics.

That is not necessary. My amendment would allow the administration to go ahead and build their temporary facilities and to conduct their military exercises. It would only require the administration to come back to Congress if it plans to make these facilities permanent.

It would also prohibit the use of these facilities for any purpose other than the exercises or for the evacuation or self-defense of U.S. military personnel.

Mr. President, if I understand my colleagues correctly who support the administration in these activities, their defense is that the facilities in Honduras are only temporary and are just for the purpose of these military exercises. They are said to be incidental to the exercises. And the engineering battalions who construct them are gaining valuable experience. That is what it is all about we are told: exercises, maneuvers, and training.

If that is the case, it is difficult to understand what possible objection could be raised to this legislation that I am proposing. If I had my way I would go much farther.

I wanted to stop all of the construction in Honduras because I believe firmly that the facilities already in place are more than adequate to conduct large-scale exercises there. But I realize that there is little chance for passage of an absolute ban on new construction in Honduras.

So I will accept the reality of the situation.

But I think the amendment that I offer represents a workable compromise, and I am sure that my colleagues would not object to placing the limitations on the administration that I am advancing here since the administration claims it is already operating under these limitations.

My amendment really only requires that the administration follow the rules and procedures of the Congress, which my opponents say they are doing already. This is not some argument over congressional prerogatives—this is basic to the checks and balances of our Government.

Simply stated, these new airfields represent a capability that has never been presented to the American people and never approved by the Congress of the United States.

They provide us with a substantial new capability to intervene militarily in Central America that was not present before. And yet the administration has built these facilities with no oversight, with no public discussion, with almost no congressional debate. They have used funds taken from their operation and maintenance account which should be used to buy fuel, ammunition, and so forth, to pursue a dubious military buildup which could have, I think, grave implications for the foreign policy future of this country.

I think there is a very serious question as to whether or not the Congress would have approved these installations and approved their construction, had they been properly and openly presently. Perhaps that is the reason they were not.

I do not think that this is the proper way, Mr. President, for this administration or any other administration to pursue foreign policy objectives.

Under another administration, presided over by a President of my own party, we slipped step by step into a military quagmire in Vietnam, and we only woke up after it was too late. And during the course of those events in the 1960's, the American people felt they had been lied to, and indeed the proof has shown that they were correct in that assumption. and I submit that the relationship between the people of this country and their Government has never been the same since those days when they lost confidence and trust in what their Government was telling them about our foreign policy objectives around the world and what the United States was up to in Vietnam.

That tragic mistake resulted in the Congress of the United States assuming a greater role in overseeing and providing a balance to the military adventures of the executive branch.

This administration appears intent on thwarting those checks and balances and going back to the old way of acting unilaterally. I submit that we here in this body have the responsibility for seeing that that does not happen. We are entrusted with the responsibility of insuring that the administration's policies are in the best interests of our Nation.

Millions of dollars are involved in this construction—all taxpayers' dollars. It is possible that our involvement could lead ultimately to the loss of American lives. We have already lost one American helicopter pilot who strayed over the border into Nicaragua; or something happened there, we are not sure. But despite the stakes in this matter, the administration has chosen to circumvent the regular process. And I do not think that a couple of generals and a handful of unelected officials in the executive branch of the Government, who have masterminded this unwarranted buildup without proper congressional approval, have the authority to do so. They have stretched existing law almost, if not actually, to the breaking point.

The constitutional processes established in our Government exist for a vital and compelling reason—to insure that our policies are established openly as befits a free people and with the full representation from and of the American people.

My legislation puts Congress on record against any backdoor buildup of a military infrastructure in Honduras similar to what we saw in Thailand over 20 years ago. The effect of my amendment would be to require the administration to do what it should be doing already—come to this Congress for approval of any construction in Honduras which is not temporary.

Now let me elaborate for a moment about the risks we are taking in allowing the administration to continue unchecked in its construction plans for Honduras.

One of the two airfields that I mentioned earlier is now being constructed, Jamastran, 15 miles from the Nicaraguan border in southern Honduras. The airfield will be constructed by the 865th Engineer Battalion.

Jamastran is less than 20 miles from the area in the mountains where the Contras are reported regrouping for attacks into Nicaragua. And already heavy fighting has been reported in this area, with substantial loss of life.

In response to the massing of U.S.-backed Contra forces, the Government of Nicaragua has sent tanks and artillery north to protect its borders from the expected attacks. Now we see the administration is placing U.S. troops in an area where it is very possible for them to get caught up in a crossfire. And they are being placed there without being required to state why they are putting them in that location.

When I was in Honduras, I met with the leadership of the Contras. And they made no secret of their desire to involve the United States militarily in their war against the Sandinista government. Now I have no brief for the present Government in Nicaragua. But I think it is clear that that Government cannot be overturned by the Contras alone. The Contras want the United States to intervene militarily on their side. They understand that if troops of the United States were caught in a crossfire, it would substantially increase the risk of U.S. military intervention in Central America.

No U.S. officials have been able to explain to me why we need to build the airfield at Jamastran for the new exercises coming up.

Clearly, with U.S.-constructed airfields and airstrips and runways in virtually every province of that small country, we have more than ample facilities to support the military exercises. Indeed, one Honduran remarked to me that on a per capita basis they have more airfields and airstrips now than any country in the world.

So the question recurs: Why is the Pentagon insisting on building at Jamastran, particularly in the face of such dangers and growing hostilities? It makes no sense to this Senator. In fact, it appears foolhardy and irresponsible.

Let me ask my colleagues: How many of you in this Chamber would have voted to build the airfield at Jamastran if we had had the opportunity to vote in the regular authorization and appropriation process?

Mr. President, I submit that this amendment is moderate. It should be passed. I frankly confess that it does not go as far as I would personally like to see it go. But I think it will stand as an expression of congressional concern. It will stand as a signal to the administration, and to the American people that the Congress intends to be a full partner in the Central American policies of this country. It will say to the administration that we in the Congress are looking over your shoulder in Central America.

Last June, the Secretary of Defense, Mr. Weinberger, told a national television audience "The central fact is we are not planning to build airfields in Honduras or in other places." This was last June. Since that time, we have constructed five and are constructing two more.

It is time for Congress to slow down this construction before it results in tragic consequences. Already, we have seen the tragic consequences of committing our troops to a foreign land without any clear policy objective, without any clear mission. The tragic lessons of our involvement in Lebanon should not be forgotten so soon.

The Secretary of State in recent days has sought to shift the responsibility for the failure of our policies in Lebanon to the Congress. I would say to the distinguished Secretary that the Congress did not put forces in Lebanon. The Congress indicated that the administration had at least 18 months to maintain military forces in Lebanon, yet the administration unilaterally took our forces out of that country in what I think was a wise move. They did so after it became apparent that their policy was not well thought out, that our mission there, whatever it might have been, could not be accomplished. This represents, I think, a signal of foreign policy failure.

That failure in Lebanon did not occur because the Congress did not support the administration strongly enough. I say that if the Congress shares any responsibility for the tragic failure of American foreign policy in Lebanon, it is that we did not step in and vigorously oppose those policies before they resulted in the loss of over 200 young marines, 3 from my native State of Tennessee. We cannot afford to make a similar mistake in Central America.

Mr. President, I urge the adoption of my amendment. I inquire of the Chair how much time I have remaining.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Twenty-seven minutes.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I will yield to the Senator from New Mexico 10 minutes. Is that adequate?

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, that is certainly adequate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, I would like to commend the Senator from Tennessee for his leadership on this issue, and for the amendment that he has of which I am proud to be a cosponsor.

I want to begin by putting this issue in the context of our Central American policy, as I see it.

I believe we have three major problems with our Central American policy today. The first, I would argue, is the extreme emphasis that we are putting on military support and military funding to solve the problems in that region. We have had extensive debate here in the Senate in the last week focusing on the proper level of military support, and focusing upon what conditions we should put on any military assistance we provide to the countries in that region.

The second major problem with our policy in Central America is the issue we have been debating, yesterday and again this morning, in connection with aid to the Contras, the guerrillas who are fighting against the Sandinista regime with the aid and support of our Government.

The third problem that I believe exists with our Central American policy is the one that the Senator from Tennessee is focusing on with this amendment; that is, the very substantial military buildup, and increase in U.S. presence that is taking place particularly in the country of Honduras.

The amendment that has been proposed here by the Senator is in my view a message to the administration and to the American people that those of us in the Senate, and in the Congress are aware of this military buildup and also that we are concerned about the excessive nature of this military buildup.

The details of it are well known to people who are following this issue, and have been largely recited by the Senator from Tennessee. We have one airbase that we have funded, which I think would be properly referred to by the Defense Department, as a colocated operational base although they generally do not refer to it this way.

I asked in one of our Armed Services Committee hearings if it was not proper to refer to this as really a colocated operational base that we would have with Honduras. This is the facility at Palmerola. The witness from the Defense Department was certainly not willing to accept that characterization totally but could not cite to me any reason why the characterization was improper. It is a facility where the United States has personnel permanently stationed. It is a facility where we have provided a substantial amount of the military support and financial support needed for construction. It is a facility where the Hondurans also have personnel stationed on a permanent basis, and they have provided some financial support for construction also.

In addition to that and La Ceiba which was already a facility, we in the Congress have appropriated funds to upgrade additional airfields and airstrips in the nature of landing strips that the Senator from Tennessee has referred to.

I think serious questions have to be raised as to why this extensive infrastructure is necessary for anything that has been described to us in the Congress as being the policy of this administration. I think it is totally proper that we ask those questions, and require responses. This amendment is intended to require that kind of accountability in the future.

I want to address for a minute the issue of whether or not there is a problem which this extensive building of infrastructure causes. I believe it is mainly objectionable because I see it as closing off the diplomatic options available to this country. We have a great deal of rhetoric coming out of the administration about how we support the Contadora process.

We are looking for opportunities to reduce tensions in the region. But, Mr. President, the fact is that it is extremely difficult to reduce tensions and to find any kind of peaceful solution to the problems of Central America while we are on the other hand pursuing a relentless buildup of our own military presence in Honduras.

I believe sincerely, Mr. President, that based upon the facts that have been laid out by the Senator from Tennessee, it is clear that we are engaged in a relentless, consistent buildup of our own military presence there.

I think the policy is also misguided in that it does increase the likelihood that we will be pulled into a larger military conflict in the region. It does give us a false sense of security. I believe it is clear that, if you look at the history of our involvement in Latin America or elsewhere in the world, having a military base in a particular country does not give us any assurance that that country will be free from influences hostile to this country.

The Guantanamo Naval Base is a clear example of how any sense of security we might feel with regard to our own friendship with the Hondurans should not be based upon our ability to construct facilities in their country.

A final issue that I think is objectionable about the extensive buildup, and one that is of concern to citizens in this country, is the cost. There is no doubt that the deficit problem we face in this country is never going to be brought under control if we in the Congress cannot even hold the executive branch of Government and the Defense Department accountable for the expenditures they make in a country like Honduras. I think that is a crucial part of what is at stake here.

Let me also say that I believe it is valid to make the point that this amendment is needed, if Congress is going to assert its rightful place in our constitutional system.

Congress has not been involved in the decisionmaking about the military construction that has taken place in Honduras. That construction has been taking place as a side effect or a by-product of what has been referred to here as military exercises or military maneuvers.

Those exercises were first proposed to us by the administration as routine in nature, short-lived in nature. They were to be temporary and not of great concern to us.

Mr. President, I remember a hearing we had in the Armed Services Committee last year, and I asked Secretary Weinberger why it happened that there was a press conference by the Defense Department on the issue of our military exercises in Central America before any action was taken to brief Members of Congress on that.

His response was, "The simple fact is maneuvers are a very standard part of the Department's activities, and exercises of all kinds are conducted all over the world on a regular basis."

The import of his response, clearly, was that this was routine and there was no need to involve Congress in these routine matters; these exercises were nothing out of the ordinary.

As it turned out, the particular exercise, Big Pine I and then Big Pine II, and now Granadero I are part of the routine. These are some of the largest exercises in U.S. military history, and certainly so for that part of the world.

It is clear also that the end of these exercises is nowhere in sight.

I asked General Gorman at one of our hearings what the plans were for future exercises. He conceded that President Suazo of Honduras, "has said repeatedly that he would like to see exercises 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6," but, according to General Gorman, in spite of these statements any future exercises were uncertain because we had to await a determination of whether the country of Honduras would be willing to invite us for additional exercises.

I would submit, Mr. President, that we in the Congress are not getting the full story about our plans in Honduras, and we are not getting the full story about the extent of the military buildup that is in progress in that country.

I think the exercises in that part of the world are anything but routine, and I would suggest that the facilities that have been described by the Senator from Tennessee are anything but temporary.

Mr. President, I believe it has to be of concern for those of us in the Congress.

Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. President, I commend the Senator for the excellent work he has done in this area in his position as the ranking member of the Military Construction Subcommittee of the Armed Services Committee.

Mr. President, at this time I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Nebraska (Mr. ZORINSKY).

Mr. ZORINSKY. I thank my colleague from Tennessee.

Mr. President, I am very happy to cosponsor this measure and to be part of this effort to head off what I believe could be a disaster in Central America. I want to make it clear right at the outset what I am talking about. The disaster to which I refer is direct U.S. military involvement without justification. Yes, the course that we are on in Honduras, where the United States is quickly establishing a permanent military infrastructure, is a course which is leading to the participation of U.S. troops in a Central American war.

Senator SASSER's amendment would help to change this present course toward a U.S. military permanence in Honduras. It would hold the military to its word that facilities are temporary and for use only for military exercises. It would assure that the military would not be constructing airfields and other military facilities for permanent use under the guise of what now seems to be a never ending series of military maneuvers. The U.S. military started out with Big Pine I in Honduras. Then we had Big Pine II. Now the U.S. military is starting Grenadero I and, to be sure, Grenadero II will follow. Or will it be Big Pine III, to be followed by IV, V, VI, VII, VIII, et cetera. Or maybe we should hold a contest to name the next series of exercises.

The Sasser amendment would prevent the conversion of temporary facilities into permanent installations and reasserts that any construction of other than temporary facilities must be specifically authorized and appropriated by Congress. This amendment puts the U.S. military on notice that the Congress is very much aware of its enlarging role in U.S. policy in Central America and that now is the time for this role to be cut back to its normal dimensions, especially in Honduras.

Mr. President, I would like to point out that I do concur with the Senator from Alaska, with his assessment of military threat to this country in that particular region and throughout the world. That is one of the reasons I supported the reactivation of the battleship New Jersey and why I supported rapid deployment forces.

But I feel it has not been proven yet to this Senator that we are not capable of defending this Nation in the event of crisis. The defense of this country is paramount and is the bottom line of everything that we do militarily. I would certainly support our continued support of the military.

But in this particular instance, we have carriers certainly capable of taking off and landing aircraft regardless of these temporary airbases being established as permanent facilities.

I think the taxpayers of this country are just getting sick and tired of being the stuckees. Every time we get into a situation like this, we build a temporary airfield; then we make it permanent; then we upgrade it; then we abandon it; then there is a revolution; then we lose control of it; and then our adversaries generally end up with a real great airbase or airfield. I will not take the time to delineate, all over the world, where we have built airbases for the opponents and adversaries of the United States of America that we have turned over to them.

If we are going to build air bases throughout the world to foreclose the possibility of governments speaking against us, then I think we do not need to have aircraft carriers stationed anywhere near that area. We do not need to have in-flight fueling capability. SAC headquarters is very good at doing that. We have the capability to do what needs to be done in that part of the world, without step by step getting us into an involvement accidentally or unilaterally from which we cannot extract ourselves.

Mr. President, we all know the reason for this extensive military activity in Honduras. We all know it is designed to keep the pressure on the Nicaraguan Government and to force the Sandinistas into drastic mistakes with severe consequences for them and their nation. The thousands of U.S. troops on the Honduran side of their border, the increasing number of airfields capable of landing C-130's, and with easy modification, quickly made capable for strategic fighter aircraft, the not-so-secret cooperation with Contra forces, and open cooperation with the Honduran military, present the very real potential for involvement of U.S. troops in a Central American conflagration. As I said on opening this statement, that is my chief concern.

The people of Nebraska want to support the policies of their President. But I know that the mothers of Nebraska are not willing to send their sons to die in the mountains of Honduras and Nicaragua. I tell you right now, Mr. President, they want to support a policy for peace, not for war. They want to support a policy that strives to engage both the United States and Nicaragua, along with other nations of the region, into a meaningful dialog for peace. The opportunity for peace lies in the Contadora process. I would like the administration to put into practice what they are saying about the process and really put the emphasis on finding a peaceful way out of the morass that faces us in Central America.

I congratulate Senator SASSER on his fine amendment, and I am happy to support it.

Mr. President, I yield back to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Nebraska for his very perceptive comments. I might say that the Vietnamese and the Soviets are enjoying the extensive facilities we left them at Cam Ranh Bay just a few years ago, facilities which cost the American taxpayers millions of dollars.

I was talking to an American pilot who returned a few months ago from Hanoi. He told me that the first-line jet fighters of the Vietnamese armed forces now are F-5's that the American taxpayers paid for. And I might note that we left behind 971,000 M-16's, at $250 apiece, when we left Vietnam.

Mr. President, I yield 4 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Nebraska (Mr. EXON).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I thank the Chair. I thank my friend and colleague from Tennessee.

I am very pleased to join Senator SASSER and my colleague from Nebraska (Mr. ZORINSKY) and several other Senators in cosponsoring this amendment.

This is the most straightforward and uncomplicated of all of the amendments that have been offered to this bill. It simply requires what I believe to be the law affecting appropriations. I think that is what we all want and expect, and if the law is followed, then no one could, in good conscience, vote against the amendment that is presently pending. This amendment simply provides, except for the emergency conditions spelled out in the amendment, that operations and maintenance funds cannot be used to provide for permanent military installations in Honduras.

Why is Honduras spelled out? This could well be applied to all parts of the world. Honduras is spelled out, I suggest, Mr. President, simply because we are at the present time, we suspect, applying considerable amounts of money not appropriated for that purpose to build airstrips and related facilities, which, in a sense, is not only a violation of the law, but bypasses the intent of Congress in the hearings and the detailed studies that have been made therewith.

I simply wish to say, Mr. President, that when you look at Honduras today and understand what is going on there from a public perspective, let alone a closed perspective, any rational person would have to say that we are at this time either preparing for or have in Honduras today an American expeditionary force. But that has not been debated in the U.S. Senate. Maybe we should send an American expeditionary force into Honduras. Maybe that is in the security interests of the United States. But, Mr. President, what we are doing is approaching that through the back door.

I cannot believe that the amendment that has been offered by the Senator from Tennessee does not directly affect this matter. We are simply saying to the administration and to the Pentagon that no money—no money—appropriated for nonpermanent construction facilities can be used to construct permanent military facilities in Honduras. We will debate, I suspect, at some other time, whether or not we should send an American expeditionary force into Honduras if it is not there already. The point is, this amendment says, "Do not misappropriate and use money to build permanent facilities when the money was appropriated for another purpose." That is all it says. Therefore, I urge the adoption of this amendment by the U.S. Senate.

I yield back any remaining time to my colleague from Tennessee.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Nebraska.

How much time is remaining on our side, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Six minutes remain.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SASSER. I yield to my friend from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I know the Senator was good enough to accommodate the leadership by reducing his time from 4 hours to 2 hours. I wonder, if he wants to retain the last 6 minutes, whether I could have 10 minutes on the bill.

Mr. BYRD. How much time does the Senator want?

Mr. KENNEDY. Ten minutes on the bill.

Mr. BYRD. I yield 10 minutes on the bill to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. I thank the leader.

Mr. President, over the past week, many of us in this body have voiced our concern over the Reagan administration's relentless march toward a military solution in Central America. Nowhere is the rumble of that military buildup more resounding than in Honduras.

This debate on administration policy toward Honduras in the full Senate is long overdue. The administration has involved that country in the fighting in Nicaragua and drawn it to the brink of war in El Salvador.

As a result of the efforts of Senator SASSER and others, Congress and the country are at last beginning to awaken to the full dimensions of the administration's omnious designs on Honduras. Today we have an opportunity to reject this militaristic approach, before we ignite a wider war that could engulf all of Central America. This past weekend, the chief Honduran architect of that buildup, General Alvarez, was fired. Today let us seize this opportunity to press forward to achieve what the Honduran Foreign Minister has called a new impetus to peaceful coexistence in Central America.

Over the past year, the President has presided over massive U.S. military exercises in Honduras. In the course of these exercises, the administration also embarked on a dramatic buildup of military facilities.

Thousands of American troops in Honduras have participated along with carrier battle groups operating off both coasts of Central America.

Let us not forget last summer when the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee (Mr. PERCY) pointed out to the Secretary of State that not a single Member of the Senate or the House was consulted on the stepped-up show of military force in Central America.

The military exercises, the administration tells us, are to show our friends and our foes that there is a credible deterrent available in the United States. The administration also tells us that military construction is synonymous with commmitment.

But what are those administration commitments? When I asked the Secretary of Defense, he told the Senate Armed Services Committee that we had made no commitment.

The American people are entitled to know what our Government's intentions really are and what risks we incur before the way is paved for a permanent American military presence in Honduras, and before American troops become involved in conflict there.

The risks of conflict involving U.S. forces are real. One American officer has already lost his life when the helicopter he was flying in January strayed into Nicaragua and was then shot down on the Honduran side of the border. More exercises risk more American casualties. Congress must ask whether those risks are warranted.

The big pine series of exercises launched last year were unprecendented in complexity, scope and duration, at times, the Central American isthmus was bracketed by two U.S. aircraft carrier battlegroups and up to 5,000 American troops maneuvered across Honduras. Four airfields have been built or improved during these exercises. Roads have been improved, tank traps dug, and radar stations deployed.

But with the conclusion of Big Pine II in February, 1,900 American military personnel remained behind to prepare for the next exercise. Presumably, when that exercise is concluded, the administration will continue to maintain what it calls a temporary presence. Administration officials have stated that U.S. military forces will be sent to Honduras to train each year for the foreseeable future, perhaps for as long as 20 years.

Last Sunday, the administration began a new military exercise in Honduras called Granadero I. Troops from Guatemala, Panama, and El Salvador have been invited to participate; 800 U.S. Army engineers are to be sent to upgrade dirt airstrips at two strategic locations—one 20 miles from the Salvadoran border and one 25 miles from the Nicaraguan border, not far from where the U.S. helicopter was shot down earlier this year. American military forces are thus being brought ever closer to the conflicts in El Salvador and Nicaragua.

President Reagan was asked at a press conference last July whether he saw any contingency where an incident during training exercises might lead to deeper American military involvement in Central America. In response, he said, "No, I do not really because—first of all, those maneuvers that are going to be held in Honduras are not going to put Americans in any reasonable proximity to the border."

That is what the President told us 7 months ago, but that is not what is happening today. Will the administration assure us today that these forces really will be out of harm's way?

When Granadero I ends, a further exercise is planned for May involving an additional 1,000 troops to be sent to Honduras for antiguerrilla warfare training.

What we are seeing is the establishment of a major and continuous American military presence in Honduras and the construction of a network of facilities that American forces could use in support of contingency plans in Central America.

Senator SASSER has investigated this American military presence with great skill and concern. "Using the screen of military exercises," Senator SASSER has reported:

> The Department of Defense has constructed a number of facilities in Honduras, including airfields, base camps, and radar sites which far exceed the requirements for the conduct of military war games.

These facilities were not approved by the Congress. These facilities were built using funds from the Defense Department's operations and maintenance account, on the justification that these were temporary facilities for use during exercises.

In February, I wrote to Secretary Weinberger, based on my growing concern that administration actions went beyond the scope of existing congressional authorization. I asked for information as to funds in the budget intended to be spent for exercises and military construction in Honduras. I have not yet received that accounting.

Senator SASSER's amendment establishes in law the temporary nature of facilities constructed during the exercises, prevents their conversion into permanent facilities, and limits their use solely to military training exercises. This is the bare minimum we should require of the administration.

Critics of this modest proposal have argued that it serves no useful purpose. I could not disagree more. This amendment will prevent any circumvention of congressional intent. It will also assure Congress of its proper role to exert oversight over the Department of Defense activities in Honduras. The amendment sends an important signal to President Reagan: "Mr. President, do not take us for granted; do not ignore us; most of all, do not deceive us."

I fully support this amendment. I hope my colleagues will do likewise.

I wonder if I could ask the Senator from Tennessee a question. In his own review of those particular facilities and as a member of the Appropriations Committee, does he believe that the kinds of sites being temporarily constructed in Honduras are similar to the kinds of sites which are constructed in other areas of the globe, such as in Western Europe where we do have continuing commitments?
